INTRODUCTION

When the study of the infinitive and its attendant locutions suggested itself as a desirable contribution to the understanding of Spanish syntax, the subject was first thought of with especial reference to the present-day forms of speech. A little application and reflection, however, was sufficient to establish the importance of laying a sure foundation on the testimony of the earliest literary documents. In the course of time it has come about that the present volume is at last submitted to scholars in the modest hope that it may serve not only as a systematic record of the facts in the case, but also and especially as an aid in the comprehension of modern phenomena in the light of their origin and historical relations.

Two distinct methods of treating the available material are well illustrated by the two earlier outstanding studies of a similar nature: by Richard Otto's Der portugiesische Infinitiv bei Camões and R. Dittes's Über den Gebrauch des Infinitivs im Altprovenzalischen, to be found respectively in volumes 6 and 15 of Romanische Forschungen. Otto coördinates his material in chapters on the pure infinitive, the infinitive with á, the infinitive with de, etc., completing, as he advances, under the caption of the various prepositions, each successive division of his entire subject. Dittes, on the other hand, considers of prime interest the grammatical category to which each of the infinitive constructions belongs, e.g., the infinitive as subject, the infinitive as object, etc. Each of these two methods has its obvious advantages, the first chiefly in that it emphasizes the importance of the function of the preposition in the various infinitive locutions, the second in that it follows more consistently a well-ordered grammatical plan. That of Otto is the more practical, because it relates itself the more readily to the facts of the modern language, the infinitive being generally thought of not as a grammatical abstraction but as a dependent of its prepositional concomitant. It is also the more feasible because it avoids the juxtaposition of numerous heterogeneous examples that occurs when large grammatical categories, such as the "infinitive as object," are manipulated in aggregations that are bound to become unwieldy. Dittes, for example, assembles under the object-infinitive no less than fifteen groups of verbs, classified according to general resemblances of meaning, to which he is compelled to append — in a final counsel of desperation — a sixteenth group of unclassifiable cases (verbs die sich in keine der bisher angeführten Gruppen einreihen lassen). If Dittes had made a really thoroughgoing study of his entire field — which unfortunately he was very far from doing — he would doubtless have found himself involved in various still more trying complications. Subtleties of classification may make a certain appeal to the investigator's cunning, but have little if any value to the outside world; on the contrary, they definitely detract from a clear vision and apprehension of the actual problems in hand, since the greater part of the investigator's effort is directed towards the systematization rather than toward the elucidation of the many interesting phenomena encountered in his quest.

These treatises by Otto and Dittes may also serve as striking examples of two divergent notions as to the choice of the territory to be covered in such investigations. Dittes undauntedly selects a whole literature and then proceeds to glean an occasional illustration from each of a large number of sources. Otto, on the other hand, studies the use of the infinitive as exemplified in Camões alone, but does so in such careful detail that valuable bases for comparison as to the frequency, import, scope and nuances of each individual construction are offered for the edification of the reader. In accomplishing this, Otto has at the same time pointed a valuable moral. If an investigation of this type is not exhaustive, it misses the greater part of its potential significance. It is not enough to give a cursory consideration to the more striking and conspicuous phenomena; the rare and remote construction may be the very one that is needed to demonstrate an obscure but interesting point.

In the present study an earnest effort has been made to treat thoroughly a few of the earliest texts of the old Spanish literature rather than to cover all texts in a necessarily superficial and inadequate way. Continual use has been made of R. Menéndez Pidal's masterly edition of the Cantar de mio Cid, both because of the excellent text of the Cid therein provided and because of the many keen observations made by this foremost Spanish scholar on all the phenomena noted in his poem. Of Gonzalo de Berceo all the extant works have been utilized, the edition of John D. Fitz-Gerald for the Vida de Santo Domingo de Silos and that of Antonio Solalinde for El Sacrificio de la Misa, along with Florencio Janer's presentation of Berceo's poems in Volume 57 of the Biblioteca de Autores Españoles. These latter include, beside La Vida del . . . Sancto Domingo de Silos and Del Sacrificio de la Missa, La Estoria de Sennor Sant Millan, El Martyrio de Sant Laurençio, Loores de Nuestra Sennora, De los Signos que aparesceran ante del Juicio, Milagros de Nuestra Sennora, El Duelo que hizo la Virgen Maria el Dia de la Pasion de su Fijo Jesu Christo and the Vida de Sancta Oria, Virgen. Morel-Fatio's edition of the Paris manuscript of the Libro de Alixandre has been made use of, as well as Janer's text in the Autores Españoles. By way of contrast with the above poetical works the Primera Crónica General (edition of R. Menéndez Pidal) was chosen because it contains an abundance of prose in a well-established text, and because the plural authorship offers a greater variety of constructions than would be found in other texts of similar extent. By reason of its slightly later date the Crónica not only offers a most valuable basis for comparison between the prose and the poetry, but serves excellently to indicate the progressive tendencies of the language in ordinary use.

Detailed mention need not be made here of all the works consulted in the progress of this study; these are more appropriately noted elsewhere. It may be said, however, that the monumental works of Diez and of Meyer-Lübke on the grammar of the Romance languages have been found of the greatest possible usefulness, the syntactical theories of Diez having often proved themselves peculiarly sound, in spite of the fact that in special fields his investigations have been largely superseded by those of more recent scholars.

While this volume has been in course of publication there has appeared under the auspices of the "Centro de Estudios Históricos" and of R. Menéndez Pidal La Oración y sus Partes by Rodolfo Lenz — a syntactical study of modern Spanish along the newer psychological lines. This volume marks a decided departure from the traditional view of words and their relations, and must be taken serious account of by future expositors of Spanish syntax. The work is of special interest to linguistic scholars in general as well as to Hispanists, inasmuch as the well-known Chilean investigator has made in it an abundance of comparisons between constructions in Spanish, English, German, and South American Indian dialects. Regret must be expressed that more intimate references to it have not been possible in the body of this study.

To Professor Henry R. Lang of Yale University most cordial thanks are due for the suggestion of the subject treated and for the direction of initial efforts; to Professor Federico de Onís of Columbia University for valuable advice; and particularly to Professor Henry A. Todd of Columbia University for constant inspiration and aid during all stages of its development.

PART I

THE PURE INFINITIVE

I. THE INFINITIVE AS SUBSTANTIVE

1. Brugmann¹ shows the origin of the infinitive to have been in the so-called nomina actionis, and he states:

An infinitive may be said to be completely formed when the noun is no longer regarded as a case-form belonging to its own system, and its construction no longer follows the analogy of its original use as a noun. . . . Before, however, such forms were completely isolated from the nominal system, they passed through a number of intermediate stages, and hence it is often hard to say whether any particular form should be called an infinitive in the strict sense of the word.

In Latin the infinitive showed close similarity to the noun, but was capable of use only in the nominative and accusative cases.² It is true that as a substantive it could take the possessive adjective with it, but otherwise it was much restricted. In the early Romance period, when case distinctions disappeared, there disappeared also the distinction between noun and infinitive caused by difference of form. At this point, then, began the fusion of noun and infinitive uses that has progressed to so great an extent in all the Romance tongues. This dual nature — viz., of substantive and of verb — is generally quite easily perceptible in the infinitive, even in those Old Spanish occurrences where the infinitive is clearly treated as a substantive. The capacity of the infinitive to stand in

- sobrepuiaua en piedad et en dar elmosnas Cron 688a21
et non de muerte nin morir, mas uenir Cron 701b50
ca tal muerte conuiene a nos, et tomarla en tal articulo Cron
701b45
con largos abondos de armas e de lidiar Cron 703b5
prometiendoles . . . mucho bien et mucha merçed, et meiorarles los fueros, et baxarles los pechos Cron 705a42
demandaron fabla et traer pleytesia con el rey Cron 766a37

In these citations the verb nature of the infinitive is clearly seen, yet also the ease with which it is used in noun constructions. None of the customary marks of the infinitive as substantive are noted here, such as the presence of the article or of a descriptive or possessive adjective. In such instances as un beuer, etc., the concrete sense can hardly be mistaken. An approximation of infinitive to substantive can be seen in those instances where the simple infinitive is employed for either active or passive meaning, that is, where the action of the verb is merely named but not specified; e.g., in such phrases as digno de adorar it is possible to consider the verb as either active or passive, and only the context of the individual passage determines the point. In these places Latin would use the active infinitive for the active sense, and the passive infinitive for the passive sense, while in Romance the single form does duty for both senses. (The active and the passive infinitive forms of Latin were reduced to a single form in Romance, amare and amari both giving amar, etc. In the third conjugation analogy caused the adoption of the active form, duci disappearing in favor of ducere.) This does not mean that the regular compound passive, made up of esse or stare with past participle, was not used in Romance, but that in the early language the simple infinitive is much the more common with either active or passive meaning. The verb force of the infinitive, even when used as a substantive, appears more clearly in such a phrase as el venir yo than in mi venir. Furthermore, the infinitive as substantive can take an object, a fact that proves the full verb value of this doubly useful form (el tomar la villa, etc.). Diez says that Spanish surpasses her sister languages in the varied constructions of the infinitive,¹ and it is indeed true that the uses in Spanish are both numerous and delicate. In the realm of the infinitive as substantive Old Spanish is extremely prolific, whether in prose or poetry, whether in the earliest or the latest texts. In the following pages will be indicated the infinitives as substantives used with simple article modifiers, a comparatively small class; those with more complicated modifiers, such as the adjectives of different kinds; those found in the plural; those with subjective and objective genitive; and lastly those having an object expressed.

THE INFINITIVE AS SUBSTANTIVE UNMODIFIED OR WITH THE ARTICLE ONLY

2. The article with an infinitive was sufficient guarantee of the substantival nature of the latter to justify the employment of any given infinitive in the capacity of a noun.² The presence of the article did not by any means eliminate the verb value of the infinitive, but gave it a better right to act as subject or to take its place in a group of substantives. Among the infinitives used as substantives with no modification or with the articles only, the following show almost complete loss of verb force: auer, beuer, pesar, plazer, poder, saber. Yet such loss cannot be assumed as complete because of the frequency of use of any infinitive as substantive. A somewhat similar situation, but showing more of the verb, is noted in the English holdings, where even in the plural a vividness impossible in an ordinary substantive is given the word by the verb element present. Doubtless this can become a minimum, yet that it disappears completely is improbable. On the other hand, the verb idea is so predominant in andar, correr, ferir, morir, etc. that whether article or adjective is present to modify these infinitives or not, their substantival nature is not allowed to become conspicuous. In actual documents the number of infinitives with simple article modifiers is comparatively small, while those with more complicated modifiers, adjectives and adverbs, are frequent. A special temporal sense is present in al with an infinitive. This construction is current in our texts, the Cid yielding seven examples. The infinitive can take an object (al leer estos duelos), or a possessive adjective (al so mandar, Cron 66b41), but generally there is a genitive construction to be found. Illustrations of this are: Al cargar de las arcas, Cid 170; al tirar de la lança, Cid 3686; al mudar de los sacos, Cron 34a29. With verbs of motion, the genitive construction sometimes coincides with the de meaning from: Al salir de la missa, Cid 2070; al partir del abbat, Cid 1441; Al salir de la ecclesia, Cid 2241. Other examples of the al temporal are: Cid 859, 2687, 3370; Cron 116b45, 255b6, 428b14, 492a29, 624a27.

The adaptability of the infinitive as substantive is well shown in:

THE INFINITIVE AS SUBSTANTIVE IN PLURAL

3. With the sign of the plural the infinitive loses its verbal quality almost entirely, and is in large part restricted to its concrete noun sense. It will be noticed that in most cases the infinitives cited have been accepted as a part of the noun treasure of the language, and except philologically would hardly be classed under the category of infinitives. Velares, however, is an example of an infinitive in the plural retaining a considerable portion of its verbal force (en combatimientos et torneos et en velares, Cron 746a16).

THE INFINITIVE AS SUBSTANTIVE VARIOUSLY MODIFIED

4. Examples are given in this section of the most current constructions of the early language in which the infinitive acts as a substantive with various modifiers, such as descriptive, demonstrative, and possessive adjectives. As noted by Diez,¹ the adverbs bien and mal (bien estar, mal estar, etc.) can be combined with an infinitive to form new substantives. Thus by utilizing the infinitive in numerous new combinations, a considerable new vocabulary with no small degree of color and vividness was ready for popular use. For this is the main function of the infinitive as substantive, that it lends vividness and color to almost every phrase in which it is employed. Observe the difference between el morir and la muerte, el ferir and la ferida (the dying and the death, the striking and the stroke). As mentioned before, this quality, due to the presence of the verb in the infinitive, may become extremely small, so that a close approximation to ordinary nouns may result (in this group auer, comer, iantar, pesar, plazer, poder, vagar). This is doubtless largely due to their frequency of use, and to the absence of any adequate nominal synonyms for the concepts involved. But it seems to be more a matter of degree of loss of verb strength than of absolute loss, since it requires little effort to see even in these instances a part of the verb element surviving.

Iantar is the only feminine substantive-infinitive in Old Spanish. The feminine here is doubtless due to the frequent association of iantar with çena, as suggested by Cornu (Romania XIII, p. 307). At least five instances of such association are noted in our texts: a iantar nin a çena, SMill 192; çena o yantar, SDom 300; nin çena nin yantar, SDom 499; a iantar e a çena, Mil 277; mengua de iantar nin de cena, Mil 298; malas cenas e peores yantares, Sig 40.

- creció en la iantar Cid 304
- se guisaua la yantar Cron 433a37
- dar yantar (a) SDom 355; SMill 257; SLaur 105
- Grand yantar le fazen Cid 285

Iantar as substantive also appears in SMill 231 and Cron 665b45.

- de mucho yazer Alix 2243

THE INFINITIVE AS SUBSTANTIVE WITH SUBJECTIVE GENITIVE

5. This construction offers a minimum of interest to our study because the extreme frequency of the phenomenon in the languages of today renders it familiar to all, and there is little that can be added from Old Spanish. The noun or pronoun in the genitive relation is active, as opposed to the inactivity of the noun in genitive relation in the objective genitive construction. It is sometimes not clearly indicated whether a given genitive is acting or acted upon, whether the genitive is subjective or objective. Theoretically all cases in which the infinitive is transitive are open to confusion, actually the context permits a satisfactory solution in nearly all instances: el prender de las manos que diçimos tastar, Mil 121.

Sobrereste crescer e minguar dell imperio Cron 66a10
est escreuir de las yentes Cron 99b42
el saber de los romanos Cron 185b3
el crescer et el descrecer de la luna Cron 222a18
El cuidar de los omnes todo es vanidad Alix 968
del velar de la noche era mal quebrantado Alix 1307

THE INFINITIVE AS SUBSTANTIVE WITH OBJECTIVE GENITIVE

6. This construction is more important to our study than that with subjective genitive because the infinitive retains a considerable part of its force as a verb, so that the noun or pronoun in the genitive is felt to be the real object of the transitive verb used. As mentioned above, the exact relation in these genitive phrases is not always clear, especially when the infinitive is transitive, and therefore open to two interpretations. Of this kind is el saber de los romanos, Cron 185b3, where romanos might theoretically be either the knowing or the known. The class of intransitive verbs of motion, with which the de indicates separation, is open to the same double rendering. Menéndez Pidal¹ says of al partir del abbat, Cid 1441: "á veces coincide la forma del genitivo con el régimen propio del verbo." A good example of the infinitive as substantive with objective genitive (also infinitive) not open to confusion is Cron 85b44: es el saber

de fablar apuestamiente, where the de is evidently due to the substantival use of saber, since the verb saber does not need any de with its object.

Examples of the objective genitive are:

- Al cargar de las archas veriedes gozo tanto Cid 170
- al tirar de la lança Cid 3686
- el saber de las estrellas Cron 658b22
- ell fincar de los ynoios Cron 680a46
- el usar de sus leyes Cron 103b19
- el soltar de Sant Pedro Cron 120b6
- al bendezir de las mesas Cron 492a29
- del aorar de los idolos Cron 230b14

THE INFINITIVE AS SUBSTANTIVE WITH OBJECT

7. Diez says¹ that the substantive-infinitive having an object is more precise than the same having an objective genitive. He cites the case of il trespassar del fiume, which is capable of the same double meaning as el uencer de Roma, Cron 232a18. It is evident that if the de is omitted with verbs taking a direct object, the most precise mode of expression is employed. The construction is quite rare in Old Spanish, though Otto states² that Castilian, Catalan, and Portuguese surpass all the other Romance languages in its use. It is interesting to note that he says also that Camões does not give a single example of this phenomenon in the Luciades, considering it non-classical. None of our own citations come from the Cid, and only one from Berceo.

II. THE VERBAL PURE INFINITIVE

8. In treating the pure verbal infinitive after the infinitive as substantive, the classification of Otto for the infinitive in Camões has been utilized. This is more for convenience than because the infinitive as substantive is more important or more truly representative than the types to be treated in the sections following. In fact, it is true that as a pure substantive the infinitive does not have the more or less equally apportioned nature of noun and verb that is to be recognized in the majority of its uses. But there is no distinct line between the verb and noun uses of the infinitive, since even in the types called verbal the substantival sense can be felt, and vice versa. This is true of the pure infinitive as object, where it does not require much effort to sense a certain noun value in the verb form. For instance, cobdiçio dinero and cobdiçio ganar show the similarity and the difference between the simple noun and the infinitive. The introduction of a preposition destroys the perfect objective value of the infinitive, and permits the substantival side of its nature to be considerably less evident. Comienço trabaiar and comienço a trabaiar involve two quite different phases of the infinitive construction, the place value of the a (and in the same way the relative value of de) preventing the infinitive from really being the object of the active verb, even though currently such constructions are considered objective. Really they are substitutes for the object construction rather than that construction itself. The types of verbal pure infinitive so-called are those most fitting the substantive. This is evident from its use as subject of a verb, as predicate, and as object with numerous classes of verbs such as those of wishing, ordering, etc. It departs considerably from possible substantive value when it indicates purpose.

with the verbs of motion (venir ver, yr matar, etc.). Its use with the relative and interrogative particles (no sabe qué se far, Cid 370) is also considerably outside the realm of substantive uses. But at least two-thirds of the types without preposition show much resemblance to noun uses, while with the preposition the resemblance diminishes visibly. Of course numerous distinctly prepositional senses (such as cause, means, etc.) are completely lacking to the pure infinitive. The only common prepositional sense found in the pure infinitive is that of purpose (and goal) mentioned above for the verbs of motion. This sense is not the same, however, in the pure infinitive and in the infinitive with the prepositions a, por, para and pora. Differences of degree and definiteness exist here that will be considered under the individual prepositions. It is enough to point out here that there is a difference, and that the pure and prepositional infinitives in such instances as va besarla and va pora besarla are not really equivalent.

THE PURE INFINITIVE AS SUBJECT

9. There is no dependable means of distinguishing the subject-infinitive from the substantive-infinitive, as in the nature of the two constructions there cannot be. It seems that perhaps the subject-infinitive might well be considered as a special type of the substantive-infinitive, since in order to fulfil the function of subject the substantive element must be particularly strong in the infinitive. Yet the usual modification of the ordinary substantive-infinitive is lacking in the infinitive as subject in the cases following, the articles or adjectives being absent, and an object being present more frequently than not. As Otto says,¹ this construction was common in Latin (Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori). In Romance this type was extended, and numerous instances occur of infinitive as subject with de, at least one with a, and various dependent uses of the subject under the pure infinitive (impersonal verbs, etc.). As stated above for the object-infinitive, so here it is equally true that the pure infinitive is the logical subject use, and that the preposition disturbs the perfect harmony of the construction. De is more harmless here than any other preposition because of its tendency to become almost colorless in meaning, while the others retain under any conditions a large part of their original import. Examples of pure infinitive-subject are:

- tablados feryr non es barragania Alix 68
 a los unos castiga, a los otros falaga,
 . . . que dar que prometer a todos apaga Alix 73
 cuydar non es saber Alix 1728
 escriujiꝝ auentura seria grant folia SDom 751

 Contar las sus bondades serie grant regunçerio Mil 709 Offreçer pan e uino en el sancto altar
 offrenda es autentica Sac 65

AS SUBJECT WITH SER AND ADJECTIVE OR ADVERB

10. In this category the infinitive, which is really the subject of the form of ser employed, is subordinated to ser and its adjective or adverb, and in position as well as sense follows these. The two types found are bien es yr and es bien yr, in both of which the infinitive stands last.

- Serie mal condempnarlo Mil 143 bien es ca no es mal saber porque es esto respuesta natural Sac 284
 mejor te es a ti los dineros tomar Alix 1244
 en paz bien era tan grant tierra ganar Alix 1253

 lo mejor . . . serie despenderlos en seruicio de Dios Cron 369b26
 mejor era prouar . . . la uoluntad del cielo Cron 687b12

AS SUBJECT WITH SER AND A SUBSTANTIVE

11. Instead of ser and an adjective or adverb, ser with a substantive is quite common having an infinitive subject. The two types found are es mala cosa lidiar and mala cosa es lidiar, in which the sense of the infinitive is subordinated to that of the impersonal expression employed. Even so, there is more of a theoretical than real difference between these types and that of the pure infinitive subject in normal position: lidiar es mala cosa. The de-infinitive can appear for the pure construction in all these instances: bien es de yr, mala cosa es de furtar, etc.

- Mala cueta es, señores, aver mingua de pan hijos e mugieres veer los murir de fanbre Cid 1178
 serie grant exaramiello fablar de su bondat Alix 1541
 Non es nuestra costumbre thesoros condesar Alex 1769
 natura es del mundo deçender e sobir Alix 2192
 El tesoro de la glesia non serie derechura Darlo en malos usos en mala mercadura SLaur 37

 grant peligro era cutiano comulgar Sac 286
 serie luenga soga dezir las sus bondades SDom 93
 es tu privilegio valer al peccador Mil 866

Other examples of this construction occur in SDom 431; Alix 119, 1043; Cron 117b27, 143a7, 143b30, 189b26, 687a41, 687a44.

The substantive has a preposition in the following instances:

- como es de costumbre offreçer la mesnada Sac 67
 Serate, sancto padre, por grant yerro tenido
 Tu entrar en tal cena, yo fincar desffamido SLaur 67

The subject-infinitive itself has a subject:

- . . . non serie buen derecho
 A vassallo ageno io buscar tal provecho Mil 739 grieue cosa es dexar el omne lo que mucho a tomado en costumbre Cron 73a13
 Serie grant daño tantas gentes morir Alix 2169

Por and pora with noun may take the place of the indirect object in constructions like esme cosa pessada Refrescar las mis penas, Duelo 13:

- (por) seria fiera onta e grant mal parescer
por el Rey Alixandre a omne obedeçer Alix 26
- (pora) Non es honrra nin presçio pora omne honrrado
meterse a aventura en lugar desaguisado Alix 2257

AS SUBJECT WITH IMPERSONAL VERBS

12. Meyer-Lübke gives a concise account of the impersonal verbs with infinitive as subject, in which he says:¹

Dans les cas où l'infinitif équivaut à un pur substantif, son emploi comme sujet ne réclame aucun examen spécial. Cependant, lorsqu'il est uni à des verbes ou des locutions unipersonnels, bien qu'il remplisse la fonction d'auteur de l'action, il apparaît encore souvent avec une valeur presqu'entièrement verbale; ce sont des cas auxquels il est nécessaire de s'arrêter un instant. La règle fondamentale est celle-ci: l'infinitif n'est employé que s'il n'a lui-même aucun sujet déterminé ou bien si ce sujet est exprimé avec le verbe personnel comme régime indirect.

It will be found that these conditions are fulfilled in the citations that follow: nos conviene fablar, non lis cala fazerlo, etc. The same verb may be treated both as an impersonal (or rather as an unipersonal verb, as Meyer-Lübke calls it), and as a personal verb. Such an instance is found in conuenir, where evidently the precedence of the object caused a shift in the verb form: en otras lazerias quales conuenien sofrir a los que en tal fecho estan, Cron 746a18. Sometimes, as with pertenecer, a slightly different turn is given to the sense by the use of a preposition, in which case the verb usually becomes personal (as de is the only preposition adapting itself readily to use with the infinitive as subject): nos non pertenescie estar casados, Cron 620b23, but no pertenesçien ellas pora seer nuestras mugeres, Cron 620b14, noted on the same page as the impersonal construction.

The examples cited by Meyer-Lübke¹ for the Spanish contain the impersonals parece, acontece, es forzoso, es posible. The two latter are interesting as members of a group that is as large as the individual scholar desires, since there is an almost unlimited number of adjectives that can be combined with the third person of ser to take either the infinitive or subjunctive, especially in the modern language, where the vocabulary and the variety of nuances of expression have been much enriched. Diez² gives a much larger list of impersonal verbs and locutions, though his work applies more to the modern period than to that of our texts: basta, cale, conviene, cumple, importa, parece, toca, vale, no hay, á uno está, etc. It is interesting to note that in the early texts there are more impersonal verbs and expressions taking de with the infinitive-subject than those taking the pure construction. As said before, though this delicately intrusive de (of relation) was not as logical as the pure infinitive, still it gradually came to be used with more and more verbs, the infinitive acting either as subject or as object, until it had surpassed its more logical rival. The following verbs appear with pure and de-infinitive subject: abondar, caer, convenir, pertenecer, plazer. A group which is very numerous under the de-infinitive and is not represented here at all, is the venir group: Vinoli en coraçon de andar, etc. Various individual verbs like complir, parescer, etc., are also confined to the de class, while others equally notable, such as valer, etc., are limited to the pure construction. There is doubtless a considerable amount of chance in this fact, both in the matter of the texts available for study, and in the absence of examples of phenomena that must have existed.³

abondar.

The de-infinitive also occurs with abondar.

no les abondo deffender su tierra Cron 168b5

The almost universal use of valer in comparative sentences is to be seen in the above examples. Also the occasional use of the intrusive non after the comparative que is found, especially in the Crónica (mas ualie pechar et dar de lo que ouiescen et saluar lo al, que non perder los cuerpos et quanto auien, Cron 495b42).

THE INFINITIVE AS A PREDICATE NOUN

13. With *ser*¹ the infinitive may stand as a predicate noun in relation to the subject. This subject may be a substantive, a pronoun, or another infinitive. No examples of the first type are noted in our texts, but the second and third are by no means rare. It will be seen that sometimes the pronoun sums up a whole clause preceding, and the syntactical relation would become quite different, though the sense would remain the same, if the pronoun were omitted: la onrra del silençio, esto es callar et non fablar, Cron 680a44. The reason that these predicate uses can be included under the pure verbal infinitive is that more activity is postulated than in ordinary substantive-infinitive uses, and there are no ordinary accompaniments of the substantive such as the articles or adjectives.

The subject is a pronoun:

estos es dotar eglesia fasscas darle arras como a esposa de Cristo
Cron 540b6

morredes en Cristo, que es ueuir, ea non morir Cron 662a36
 la onrra del silençio, esto es callar et non fablar Cron 680a44
 aquello non era foyr, mas yr adelant Cron 699a23

aquello que todo fijo dalgo deue eonplir, et esto es: fazer derecho, et perder miedo alli do lo deue omne perder *Cron
 738b2*

The subject is an infinitive:

cuydar non es saber Alix 1728

imperare es estar apareiado . . . Cron 90b22

affogar omne sus hijos es dalles de pequennos et assoora grandes senñorios Cron 145b43

profession fazer el frayre, es renunçiar el mundo Cron 692a3 ea dezir de la lengua de manos non laurar, esso es flor sin frueho, prometer e non dar Sac 181

Of course the infinitive treated as a real substantive occurs in the predicate noun position:

seria fiera onta e grant mal parescer
 por el Rey Alixandre a omne obedecer Alix 26

THE PURE INFINITIVE AS OBJECT

THE MODAL AUXILIARIES

14. Under this group will be treated auer, deuer, poder, querer, saber, soler, all with pure infinitive. A few exceptions are noted to the pure construction and these will be commented on under the individual verbs. In general, however, it is evidently true that there is no reason for a preposition with these verbs; on the contrary, the presence of a preposition detracts from that perfect unity between infinitive and finite verb that has caused this group to be called the modal auxiliaries, i.e., aids in inflection of the verb put in the infinitive form. The preposition a never lost some portion of its place value, and the preposition de, though it became exceedingly weak at times, was never quite negligible in the sense of a phrase. The pure infinitive alone could accurately serve as object, and in these instances where the unity was so close that in one case at least the two parts were thought of and written as one (auer with infinitive giving the future: e.g., dar e), the use of a preposition with the infinitive was more antagonistic to the construction involved than in any ordinary object relation, such as començar with its infinitive. The auxiliaries, through continued and frequent use, came to express shades of thought not brought out in the ordinary conjugation of the verb. Thus deuer in some cases might weaken to an approximation of the future use; querer did not always express a wish as such, but developed a series of delicate related senses; saber and poder had points of contact in use, while soler and the imperfect indicative showed different degrees of definiteness of concept that might merge into each other. It was natural that the emphasis should fall more and more on the infinitive rather than on the finite verb, since the infinitive expressed the specific activity needed in the individual sentence, while the finite verb expressed only a general activity common to all.¹ It was only a matter of time until the auxiliaries came to lose nearly all their power of acting alone, and had to have another verb to form a predicate for them. One of the proofs of this close relation of finite verb and infinitive object is found in the existence of such constructions as volo habere cantatum standing for habeo volutum cantare, where the auxiliary is so weak that the sign of the perfect has gone over to the infinitive. Examples of this (lo querria auer fecho) will be cited under the various verbs concerned.

The modal auxiliaries, as might be guessed from the above, offer the most abundant examples of the verbs taking the infinitive object. By far the most common of all is of course auer with infinitive in the regular future sense. Querer and poder come next in the favor of our authors. The fact that each of these appears several hundred times in the Alixandre and proportionately in other texts, is interesting only as showing the almost continual use of these aids by good authors, and the fact that they must have become very weak indeed to be tolerated so often. No verb retaining its full sense could be used so many times in a poem without destroying its beauty. Deuer and saber are only about one-half as frequent as querer and poder, while soler, with 70 occurrences, seems almost rare by comparison.

The lists of aids in inflection given by Diez, Meyer-Lübke, and Menéndez Pidal differ each from the other. Diez includes querer, deber, poder, saber, osar, soler, of which I omit osar in my classification; Meyer-Lübke gives querer, poder, saber, deber, soler, dejar, hacer, thus retaining the two causative verbs dejar and hacer; Menéndez Pidal chooses even a more generous list, querer, gradar, dever, poder, saber, osar, treverse, soler. This shows that any grouping is necessarily flexible, and chosen for convenience as much as accuracy. Individual verbs appear to one scholar as aids in inflection that to another are no more such aids than any verb in close relation with its infinitive object. My own list includes rather a minimum than a maximum of such possible verbs.

The union of the infinitive with the present and imperfect indicative of auer formed the customary future and conditional of Old Spanish in the same way as in other parts of the Romance field (in Italy the Classical perfect habui was used instead of the imperfect habebam). Little can be added to the knowledge of this phenomenon since it is one part of the syntax of the

Hanssen states² that there were three possible ways of joining the infinitive with the form of habere (auer): dar e yo, yo dar e, and yo e dar. Old Spanish, Old Provençal, and Portuguese show a more primitive condition of these component parts than do other Romance tongues. From very early times the merging of the infinitive and the form of habere occurred in Italy and North France, but in Spain, etc., this unity was evidently not felt, as the two parts are found separated by a pronoun object (ver lo he). This will be discussed a little later. The third form of the combination of these elements (yo e dar), mentioned by Hanssen above, he finds still existing in Galicia and Portugal. In Old Spanish, however, although this form was used, it had a little more than ordinary future sense. There had been present in Vulgar Latin the two senses of possibility and necessity in the infinitive with habere, and in the Romance future the element of necessity was of course non-existent, the element of possibility having developed here. The sense of necessity was kept in the same construction, but generally when a preposition was used with the infinitive (Maguer les pesa, ovieron se a dar e a arrancar, Cid 1145). Later auer de supplanted auer a in this use, though at the period covered by this study auer a was considerably the more frequent. The preposition was not always employed when the sense of necessity was desired, however, and in these texts it is by no means rare to find form three (yo e dar) in the perifrastic sense. No other order is found than this, and doubtless the sense of necessity predominates when this order is used, though different degrees are to be felt in the examples, varying from little more than simple futurity to actual necessity. All examples of auer preceding the infinitive are given below. Concerning the possibility of absorption of the preposition a by a preceding or following (ouieron aplegar, Alix 1276), see auer a, § 45. In such instances as Ovose de las cuevas . . . arrancar, SMill 46, and ouo assacar, Cron 112b34, a may be separable from the simple verb. If not, consciousness of the incorporation of a in the infinitive may well have militated against its repetition immediately before that form.

Menéndez Pidal remarks in this connection that “auer expresa la necesidad, rigiendo al infinitivo ora con de, ora con á. La preposición falta rara vez, acaso sólo en: los que han lidiar, Cid 3523. El pretérito, rigiendo á un infinitivo con de ó á, expresa no la necesidad, sino un acaecimiento subsiguiente ó futuro respecto al tiempo pretérito de una narración.”¹ Evidently, then, there is a difference between the preterit of this construction and the other tenses. This is found to be prevailingly true, inasmuch as in the above examples instances of the preterit show little necessity, often a mere subsequent event, as noted by Menéndez Pidal. But a purely formal statement cutting off the preterit would be misleading, because the individual examples in other tenses show a varying degree of necessity, and sometimes quite as much the absence of that element as in the preterit. SLaur 70: Mucho de mayor preço a seer el tu manto shows a minimum of necessity, and a maximum of futurity. The same might be said of Cron 487b47: quando Coym-bria auie seer presa, and of Commo qui en mal anda, en mal a caer, Mil 146, where the element of futurity is strong. It is difficult to prove much concerning the pure infinitive in these tenses because of the small number of examples, the prepositional construction so largely predominating.

When Menéndez Pidal states that there is no necessity in the preterit, but merely a subsequent fact, he is stating the principle for the prepositional infinitive with auer. However, it is shown under auer a that this is not true for the prepositional infinitive, instances being found showing necessity as clearly as in any other tense. If the principle were true for the infinitive with prepositions, it would probably hold for the pure infinitive in this construction, since one of the most important facts noted in this study of the auer construction is that no dividing line can be drawn between the cases with preposition and those without. For instance, ouo todos los pleitos la dueña a saber, Alix 382, and Ovo del pleito todo venir deconnoçido, Mil 696, show decided similarity in the connotation of the infinitive constructions. There is the same sense of subse-quence in the locution in both cases. This argument might be developed much further, but without profit. The main difference between the pure and the prepositional infinitive at this time is that the pure form (the original construction) is quite rare except in the regular future sense, while the prepositional infinitive, especially that with a, is extremely common. As to the element of necessity, it can be felt in various instances in the preterit, whether there is preposition or not. Often it can be felt but not proved. And it is not to be expected that it could very often be definitely proved considering the delicacy of the sentiment involved, and its easy merging into the sense called above subsequent. Most instances can be construed with or without necessity in the preterit, but some naturally imply it, e.g., ouieron syn grado las espaldas tornar, Alix 537, where there can be no doubt as to the necessity. Also tanto ouieron atender e buscar, Alix 2224, and Ovose de las cuevas por esso arrancar, SMill 46, most fittingly take a sense of necessity as against simple subsequence. A few cases of the prepositional use having necessity are interesting for comparison with those above: maguer les pesa, oviéronse a dar e a arrancar, Cid 1145; ovieronle syn grado el canpo a dexar, Alix 654; ouieron a tollerse del portillo syn grado, Alix 214. Without necessity, but with preposition, are noted among numerous others: ouolo a vencer, Alix 166; ouo el arbol a fallar, Alix 311; ouieron a vejer, Alix 389.

Concerning the first method of combining the infinitive with the auxiliary, as mentioned by Hanssen (dar e yo), in the regular future sense, the most important fact is that the combining parts could be separated by one or more pronoun objects (ver lo he, dar gelo he, etc.). The examples of this so-called split future are quite numerous in Old Spanish, offering abundant material for study of the phenomenon. The facts are, however, very simple. Such separation of the auxiliary and the infinitive was customary in our texts when a pronoun object was present. It was not obligatory, however, as evidenced by Cid 1310: Dexarévos las posadas, and SOria 136: veráste. The separation caused no change in the sense involved, as shown by the fact that the future, united and split, could present its forms side by side in equivalent function and sense: non nos daran dent (nada); la paria . . . tornar nos la ha doblada, Cid 586. Also Cid 1438: dexaremos Burgos, ir lo hemos buscar and hir los hemos fferir, non passará por al, Cid 1690. Examples of the split future in our texts are:

- el rey querer me ha por amigo Cid 76

It is not uncommon to have contracted forms in this split future, as in Cron 41a23: antoiar se ta, where the e of te has disappeared; in Cron 43b44, fazellas is equivalent to fazer lo as, and in Cron 73b32, pedir ledes to pedir le hedes. Probably the most current contraction is formed with the first person singular present indicative of auer, where the e of me, te, le, is absorbed by the e of he (h not regularly written): Mostrarte los tesoros, SLaur 94; dexar mē morir, Cid 1029; Dezirte, Alix 1979; Darte yo casamiento, Alix 370; darle mis medeçinas, Alix 380; Darté, Mil 641; Acreerté, Mil 644; Mostrarté, Mil 648; ferté, Mil 689. Not always, however, is this absorption found: fertehe a mis rrrapazes prender e enforcar, Alix 766.

Examples of the split future for possible reference are: Cid 280, 1423, 1438, 1447, 1487, 1523, 1641, 1668, 1688, 1690, 1768, 1808, 1820, 1908, 2045, 2330, 2366, 2410, 2411, 2481, 2546, 2563, 2564, 2568, 2575, 2627, 2733, 2992, 3141, 3168, 3223, 3359, 3389, 3411, 3450, 3451; Alix 225, 752, 764, 791, 798, 902, 903, 932, 966, 1039, 1243, 1247, 1601, 1649, 1711, 1862, 1992, 2069, 2229, 2420, 2608, 2620; Loor 169, 172, 175, 181, 218; SLaur 11, 36, 76, 86, 94; Sig 36, 37, 39, 40, 44, 46, 70; Mil 137, 248, 484, 625, 641, 644, 648, 689, 739, 841, 885; Cron 401a10, 402b19, 403b15, 404b40, 415a29, 416b23, 416b33, 417b38, 421a18, 428a40, 428a41, 433b46, 434a12, 435a3, 435a6, 435a9, 435a10, 435b34, 436a21, 438a8, 440b34, 442b12, 442b14, 442b15, 442b21, 442b23, etc.

~~The conditional presents in general the same situation as the future in regard to the separation of the infinitive and the auxiliary (with the imperfect indicative instead of the present).~~

The instances of it are considerably less frequent than those of the future, but are by no means rare. Contractions are also found in the forms of the conditional even more than in those of the future, and absorption of one of two vowels coming together is noted, e.g., Semeiar mie, Sac 157; poder sie perder Carthago, Cron 46a30; darlye mala fiesta, Alix 1113. Examples of the split conditional are:

- Conbidar le ien de grado Cid 21
 dar le ien seyscientos marcos Cid 161
 buscar nos ie el rey Alfonso Cid 528 aver vos lo iedes de far Cid 678

 querermia partir Cron 33b38
 auella yen Cron 45a33
 tornar se les ye Cron 45a38
 dar se ye Cron 65b41
 combater le yen et quexarle Cron 83b22

The last citation is particularly interesting as showing that the infinitive and the auxiliary were thought of as separate entities, since here the second infinitive is allowed to stand alone, with one yen doing duty for both combater and quexar, deuer.

There is no perceptible change of meaning when the preposition a is used in the few cases in the Crónica in which deuer appears without the pure infinitive. For instance, in deuemos nos a temer, we have a slightly emphatic equivalent of deuemos temer. There seems to be no trace of deuer de in the early texts, although by the time of Cervantes it was not uncommon. Grammarians say that deuer with pure infinitive denotes duty and necessity, while with de it denotes rather probability.

The use of the tenses of deuer in Old Spanish is found to be far from fixed. The present has the variety of meanings common in French, from duty and necessity in such cases as devemos vençer, Cid 995, to the weakened necessity approaching futurity of tu deues esta cosa iuzgar, SDom 425, and the futurity or probability in deues . . . tu auer pagamiento Alix 1243. This tense is the one most commonly used, and frequently makes the action of the verb more realistic in places where other tenses, such as the imperfect or conditional, would be more logical.

Examples of the present tense of deuer with dependent infinitive will be found in the Cid 315, 1107, 1457, 3363; Alix 35, 38, 43, 65, 77, 79, 120, 222, 239, 277, 327, 352, 357, 358, 359, 454, 477, 658, 749, 770, 772, 776, 827, 931, 1140, 1206, 1210, 1243, 1254, 1313, 1314, 1323, 1348, 1422, 1425, 1641, 1652, 1677, 1689, 1792, 1829, 1865, 2232, 2254, 2270, 2308, 2347, 2365, 2369, 2372, 2375, 2401, 2416, 2421, 2487, 2562, 2563, 2634, 2635, 2637; SOria 89, 153; Mil 74, 121, 141, 158, 201, 262, 280, 351, 430, 451, 541, 542, 543, 559, 562, 786, 791, 845, 859, 868; Sac 37, 46, 47, 48, 66, 70, 99, 118, 119, 170, 172, 174, 175, 181, 190, 226, 250, 251, 260, 264, 284, 290, 291; SDom 102, 139, 145, 252, 287, 311, 312, 313, 315, 335, 425, 462, 613, 644, 658, 719, 756, 777; Loor 17, 44, 69, 104, 112, 119, 135, 155, 182, etc.

The imperfect denotes weakened necessity in cases like deuien pereçer, Sac 242. This type is common to all the texts with the exception of the Cid. This poem shows the use of deuer sparingly in all meanings, yielding only seven passages with deuer in the whole 3700 lines, a somewhat remarkable fact, considering its frequent repetition of many infinitive constructions.

Examples of the imperfect of deuer denoting weakened necessity:

- asy deuien moryr Alix 171
 non los deuie guaryr Alix 171
 deuie auer tal cabo Alix 216
 Mas el engannador lo debie padeçer Mil 207
 Cada uno en su trono en que debia juzgar SOria 86
 nol deuja ualer SDom 740

The imperfect is also found in places where the conditional would be more logical. In all the texts except the Alixandre the conditional is decidedly rare. Examples of the imperfect for the conditional:

- debiamos todos aver ende pavura Sig 67
 non fablas como deujas fablar SDom 311
 deuia seer scripto SDom 441
 deuja seer metida en arca mas preçiosa SDom 673
 Non las deviemos tomar por varraganas Cid 2759
 non gelas devién querer sus fijas por varraganas Cid 3276
 deviemos casar con fijas de reyes o de enperadores Cid 3297
 deuie seer mejor Alix 268

Other examples of the imperfect of deuer: Alix 171, 208, 223, 277, 581, 876, 1044, 1097, 1115, 1350, 1417, 1602, 1652, 1707, 1721, 1761, 1790, 1840, 2188, 2194, 2239, 2299, 2564, 2578, 2619, 2631; Duelo 125, 128, 146; Loor 115, 173, 174; SOria 24, 86; Mil 207, 398, 511, 528, 547, 548, 549, 786, 901; SLaur 38, 74; SMill 25, 40, 267, 396, 468, 469.

Berceo only uses the conditional (excluding the Alixandre) in the following passages, and it is to be noted that three cases occur in practically one passage, i.e., the use of the conditional in the first passage probably caused the use of the next two.

- Non me devries agora, padre, desemparar SLaur 65
 devriesme perdonar SLaur 66
 Non devries al tu siervo tal ira condesar SLaur 66
 Debrie andar devoto e andaba lozano Mil 162
 debriemos escribilla Mil 215
 Debriame lo misme con mis manos matar Mil 760

The conditional appears more frequently in the Alixandre than in the other poetical works:

- deurie auer toda mala ventura Alix 371
 deurien vençer vn mundo sola ment a dientes Alix 806
 Nunca en esti mundo deurie omne fiar Alix 980

Also Alix 982, 1184, 1210, 1241, 1242, 1482, 1597, 1628, 1675, 1784, 1788, 1809, 1836, 1908, 2396, 2508, 2574.

The conditional is used with the passive infinitive in:

- deurie seyer contado Alix 1411
 deurie jazer encerrado Alix 2090
 Debria ser servido con grant devoción Loor 74

The preterit occurs once in Loor 98:

por mi feçiste tanto que mas fer non debiste poder.

Little comment need be made on this most popular of verbs, as the syntax is simple and regular. Occurrences will be noted under the tenses found in the texts. The Cid, Santo Domingo, and the Sacrificio are represented in the list as well as the Alixandre as far as stanza 1000. The references are given because of any possible interest attaching to them in connection with other subjects, though they have no importance in the present study.

When quaerere supplanted volere in the Spanish peninsula, it increased the variety of its uses and senses. Concerning querer in the Cid, Menéndez Pidal remarks:

querer expresa naturalmente el deseo de hacer algo: exir querien a batalla 662, 1776, 3098, y negativo 538. De aquí pasó á indicar el comienzo de una acción, el sentido inceptivo: 'estar á punto de': la noch querie entrar 311, 231, 235, 367, 665, 696, 1143. La perífrasis sirve sólo para hacer más vehemente un ruego: no lo quiera olvidar 1444, y llega á ser casi perífrasis inútil.¹

This statement of the uses of querer with infinitive is found in general to be accurate, its only fault being that it does not take enough account of the delicate shades of sense lying between the points brought out so clearly. It is as impossible to tabulate the individual instances of querer and put them all in their respective classes as it is those of auer a, etc. It is easy to see the starting point of change in querer as well as in auer a, but after this point it is only the more glaring examples that let themselves be accurately judged. That querer did not express wish or desire on all occasions would be inferred from its very frequency in the texts considered. In the first 1550 stanzas of the Alixandre there are 300 instances of it, with approximately this proportion in other documents. The inceptive sense mentioned by Menéndez Pidal above (to be on the point of, to be nearly, etc.) is noted quite frequently. Probably numerous other instances than those cited by Menéndez Pidal or these following could be found in our texts, the only difficulty being to prove the presence of the inceptive sense rather than that of wishing. Theoretically, desire and inception may equally apply to all animate subjects. That is, in such instances as the first one cited by Menéndez Pidal (exir querien a batalla, Cid 662) and most others with personal subject, there is only the inaccurate evidence of the context to show whether querer indicates a wish or an inception. With impersonal or inanimate subject, the probabilities are clearly in favor of the inceptive sense. This is shown very well by these examples:

- Quando de la grant nave quisse fuera salir,
Ca parecie por oio que se querie somir Mil 607
Ia querie ser ora de maytines tañer, la estrella del cielo queria parescer Alix 1286
querie vn dia malo e negro amanascer Alix 1286
el sol querie apuntar Cid 682
quiérel crebar el coraçón Cid 1660
tembrar querie la tierra Cid 3619
non a queria estar SDom 454

Other instances of the inceptive sense in querer follow:

con la grant calentura del fuego que les ardie aacerca, querien se perder de sed Cron 136a32
 ya tenblaua la tapia, queria se acostar Alix 213
 querie de calentura moryr toda la gent Alix 864
 sintiosse tan flaco que entendio bien que querie morir Cron
 137b38
 El bueno de Minaya penssar quiere de caualgar Cid 1430p¹
 el marzo quiere entrar Cid 1619

In Hya quieren caualgar, Cid 2591p¹, and in SDom 1.2, Quiero fer una prosa, there is probably more of inception than of wish, but the construction is indefinite in any event.

Menéndez Pidal also says that querer "sirve sólo para hacer más vehemente un ruego." Probably, also, in being less direct it was considered more polite, removing the objectionable force of the regular imperative form. It was so used in the Santo Domingo in addressing the king:

Rey, yo bien te conseio commo a tal sennor,
 Non quieras toller nada al sancto confessor SDom 154

A parallel construction is seen in the French veuillez with dependent infinitive. Here the construction has become fixed as a form of polite address, while its use in Old Spanish was quite exceptional. When employed, it evidently conveyed more meaning than would appear in the French construction.

Compare also:

que non me quieras tan mucho segudar SDom 176
 Date al guarir luego, non te quieras tardar SDom 724

Aside from this use the present subjunctive of querer is itself not very commonly employed. The future subjunctive is more in evidence than the present, and lends itself a little more easily to the sense that the present might have. I only note three examples of the present subjunctive of querer with infinitive object in the Cid while the future subjunctive is found in at least seven passages, about the same proportion holding in the other texts:

(pres. subj.)

- Antes . . . que el sol quiera rayar Cid 231 que nos queramos ir de noch no nos lo consintrán Cid 668
 no lo quiera olbidar Cid 1444

(fut. subj.)

- Si el rey me lo quisiere tomar Cid 230
 El qui quisiere comer Cid 421
 los que lo quisieren far Cid 891
 si en estas tierras quisiéremos durar Cid 1120
 Los que quisieren ir servir al Campeador Cid 1369
 quien vos lo toller quisiere Cid 3520
 qui tuerto quisiere fazer Cid 3601

When Menéndez Pidal says that “querer llega á ser casi perífrasis inútil,” it is easy to know what he means, but hard to justify so broad a statement, especially when he cites no examples from the Cid. He remarks almost the same thing of fazer, mandar, yr, tornar a and de, when these verbs have dependent infinitive object. That is, all these locutions are said to become so weak as to give little or no meaning to a phrase other than would be given by the properly inflected form of the infinitive changed into a finite verb. There is much truth in this without doubt, since each of these locutions became a formula that diminished in strength almost in proportion to its frequency of use. But there always seems to be some remnant of the original sense left even when these locutions are at their weakest. In the case of querer it is easier to show such weakening than in fazer, etc., but even here, although the idea of wishing has allowed itself to be considerably changed and weakened, it cannot be thought a negligible factor in the sentence. One real weakening of querer is mentioned by Meyer-Lübke,¹ who states that it becomes sometimes a practical future. Querer and infinitive may be considered quite as logical a formation for the future idea as that which prevailed largely in the Romance territory, auer and infinitive. The difficulty here as elsewhere in dealing with fine shades of sense is to find examples that conclusively show the phenomena that are known to exist. Thus it is impossible to accurately gauge the proportion of real desire and futurity that was intended in single instances of querer. It is possible, however, to find examples that permit more of futurity than of desire to be read into them. Thus in the Cid 2571, hyo quiéroles dar axavar tres mill marcos de valor, futurity is more natural than desire, as is evidenced by the use of the regular future in other parts of the sentence, e.g. darvos he dos espadas, Cid 2575. Though either sense is possible in the following cases, futurity is more evident than desire:

- enbiar la quiero a Alfonso el Castellano Cid 1790
 cometer quiero un ruego a mio Cid Cid 2073
 no lo quiero fallir por nada de quanto ay parado Cid 2224
 Hyo con los mios ferir los quiero delant Cid 2358
 dárgelas queremos delant estando vos Cid 3174

Meyer-Lübke¹ states that habeo volutum cantare was replaced by volo habere cantatum (querer standing for volere in Spanish). In such cases the auxiliary has lost its original strength, and the infinitive, which to the speaker seems more important in the immediate phrase, has taken on the sign of the perfect. The construction is, however, rare in the texts considered. Only passages containing the conditional instead of the simple perfect are noted. A conspicuous example occurs in Alix 1156:

Ouiero Alixandre desti logar oydo,
 ya lo querie auer de su grado veydo,
 ya querie su ofrenda auer y ofresçido,
 e aurie de su grado de aquesa agua beuido

Non lo querria por nada aver acometido SMill 270
 no lo querrien aver fecho por quanto ha en Carrión Cid 3570 non querrien por grand cosa non seer y uenidos SDom 545

Meyer-Lübke¹ also suggests that in SMill 105, querer takes an infinitive object governed by de, and that therefore querer could be construed with de in Old Spanish in much the same way as asmar de:

Sennor, si tu quisiesses, yo mucho lo querria,
De vevir solitario commo vevir solia

This is hardly a normal example of querer de, however, since the infinitive is really in apposition with lo, and the infinitive in such apposition was used with or without de. This phenomenon is treated under the Infinitive in Apposition in § 79 of this study. One valid example of querer de does occur in Cron 450b37: adolesçiose Dios de la yent, et quiso por su merçed de mostrar esta grand coyta por quien era.

The divergence and confluence in meaning of saber and poder in sense and treatment will be seen in the examples following:

Sabiense rrica ment guardar e encobryr, por ninguna manera non se podien feryr Alix 521

tan bien se sabien amos guardar e encobrir, por ninguna manera non se podien nozir Alix 565

Porque nos alonguemos bien sabremos tornar SDom 186

Cadio antel a prieçes, mas non podie fablar:
Mas el Sennor que saue la uoluntad juzgar SDom 607

A tal sennor debemos servir, e aguadar,
Que sabe a sus siervos de tal guisa onrrar:
Nol podrie nul omne comedir, nin asmar,
En qual ganancia torna a Dios serviço far SDom 756

The concepts present in the two verbs, though distinct, show certain points of contact. Saber generally includes all of poder and adds to it its idea of knowing. Saber adds to an expression a personal touch that is absent in poder. Thus, when one of the two might be expected, the other is sometimes found in a given passage, adding or changing the sense most subtly. Saber was often used as an emphatic substitute for poder, when poder would have seemed weak and colorless because of its being one of the two most frequent infinitive-taking verbs of Old Spanish.

One interesting example of saber and infinitive, each having an object, and the personal object of saber evidently indirect, occurs in Cron 90a27: fizo el solo sin ayuda dotri lo que no sabien a otro omne fazer fasta aquella sazon. This would be considered regular according to the usage of two objects with fazer, ver, etc. References are classed below according to tense, as was done for poder above.

This verb is one of the less frequent of the modal auxiliaries. This is probably due to the fact that there were other means of expressing approximately its sense, while in the case of other auxiliaries the sense was unique. Thus the imperfect indicative might be used when no emphasis was needed, and with emphasis usar and infinitive, with or without preposition. These agencies doubtless somewhat diminished the frequency of soler with infinitive. In the Sacrificio it is noted about sixteen times, while in the Cid only one instance of it occurs. This shows considerable irregularity in its use by authors of the period. It is noticeable that the present and imperfect indicative are the only tenses represented in these texts (except for one instance of the present subjunctive in SDom 177).

THE PURE INFINITIVE WITH VERBS OF WISHING AND LIKING

15. The strongest of the verbs eligible for this class, querer, has already been treated under the modal auxiliaries, but there are several others of slightly varying sense that rightly belong here. Cobdiçiar and amar are the most frequent verbs of the group, the others appearing only sporadically. It is a striking fact that cobdiçiar alone can be used with prepositions, the others being confined to the pure infinitive object. This is not so peculiar when it is considered that the idea of wishing naturally takes an object direct rather than through the agency of the preposition, at best slightly roundabout, and it is because of this directness in reaching the object of wishing that some verb like volere, quaerere, has always been considered as a modal auxiliary in each of the Romance languages. It is also true that there is no verb of wishing or liking listed under the de-infinitive except cobdiçiar (the nearest being asmar, Eng. aim). An exceptional case under the pure infinitive is gozar, more regular with reflexive pronoun and de in the sense of to enjoy. It is also noteworthy that dessear, which is common later, occurs only twice in our texts.

This is the only infinitive construction noted for amar.

- Non amaba oir palabras de vanidat SOría 22
- amete siempre laudar e bendeçir Mil 522
- ama lidiar Cron 43a3
- amas derecho departir Alix 349

- Amaba desti mundo seer desembargado SMill 34
- Bien amarie . . . exir dest exilio de malvezeat poblado SMill 34
- Siempre amé foir esti sieglo astroso SMill 103

cobdiçiar.

The infinitives with de, a, por, are also found with cobdiçiar.

- cobdiçias allá ir SOría 158
- la que yo fer cobdiçio SDom 53
- Qui los regnos agenos cobdiçia conquerir Alix 65
- Lo que el Padre sancto cobdiçiaua veer SDom 488
- yo beuir non cobdiçio Alix 1684
- El que perder non teme nin cobdiçia ganar Alix 1917
- cobdiçian condesar Alix 1917

- con mis vasallos cobdiçio yo morir Alix 2132
 cobdiciariemos ante morir Cron 46a28
 cobdiciaua ya uerse ayuntado con los moros Cron 394b19

 cobdiciando casar con un rey Cron 454a18
 ell cobdiçiendo uenir a la mas alta onrra Cron 664b9

An equivalent of cobdiçiar is the noun locution auer cobdiçia. Expressions like this usually take de to introduce the infinitive, and are common as variants for the simple verbs. The preposition is omitted in:

- Sy avedes cobdiçia a la tierra tornar Alix 1591
 Tanto auie grant cobdiçia con Poro se fallar Alix 1965

dessear.

- desseando morir por la fe Cron 686b27
 desseando uençer o morir Cron 695a10

gozar.

Used reflexively gozar takes the de-infinitive in the sense of to enjoy.

- gozolo oyr Alix 2576

gradar.

Menéndez Pidal¹ calls this a verbo auxiliar de modo, and translates gradó exir by quiso salir.

- gradó exir de la posada Cid 200

THE PURE INFINITIVE WITH VERBS OF THE MENTAL PROCESSES

16. The verbs of this group offer more diversity in sense than is usually desired in classifying instances according to meaning. They do, however, all come under the rather general head of the mental processes. It is evident that any classification according to meaning is necessarily inaccurate, because verbs do not fall into clear-cut groups but merge one into the other almost imperceptibly, so that a given verb can often be grouped equally well in either of two classes. Evidence of this is at hand in the systems of treatment of this immediate group by various Romance scholars. Dittes, for the Provençal, chooses only saber, jutjar, and esperar for this section while considering verbs of fearing in a group by themselves. Diez¹ with the verbes de sentiment, includes temer, creer, cuidar, desear, pretender, fingir, esperar. Otto for the Portuguese puts together die Verben des Denkens, Empfindens und Sagens, sowie bei verbalen Ausdrücken, die "halten für . . ., nehmen für . . .," bedeuten. Here he groups verbs like conhecer, crer, esperar, imaginar, confessar, jurar, negar, pedir, etc. The list that seems most appropriate in Old Spanish includes asmar, cuidar and pensar — which naturally go together as verbs of thinking, — dennar (from Latin dignari . . . to consider worthy), esperar, and the verbs of fearing, temer and dubdar. It will be seen that these verbs do not so universally take the pure infinitive as the verbs of wishing above. On the contrary, the de-infinitive is more common with these verbs of the mental processes than the pure construction. The relative de (in respect to, concerning, in the matter of, relating to) fits in very well with nearly all the members of the group. Pensar almost always takes de; asmar, dubdar, and temer take de currently; while cuidar and dennar form exceptions to this usage and remain pure in a great majority of instances.

This verb occurs more often with de-infinitive.

- Asmaba esconderse en alguna socarrena,
 Non fer ningun enoio a iantar nin a çena SMill 192
 asmo fer vna cosa el solo señero Alix 600

Tener forms an emphatic perfect with the past participle of asmar in:

cuydar (cui-, cue-).

Menéndez Pidal lists *cuidar*¹ under the verbs of entendimiento & sentido along with oir and ver. Though rare with prepositional infinitive, it does occur with de, as might be expected from the frequency of de with pensar and asmar, naturally associated with cuydar. The en-infinitive is also noted with cuydar (en becomes common with pensar later). Thus, though cuydar and pensar show the effect of influence on each other, each preserves its own predominant type in our texts, pensar with de and cuydar with pure infinitive. Although the two verbs had much the same sense, they were not equivalents (pensar had the additional sense of disponerse a, empezar a, etc.)². Considerable irregularity of use is found in these verbs, some authors using one with great frequency and neglecting the other, and vice versa. Thus pensar is extremely common in the Cid, but not elsewhere. Cuydar, however, is only noted four times in the Cid, while in the Alixandre there are about seventy recurrences of it. Its proportionate frequency also varies greatly in the other texts examined.

It is noteworthy that this verb is not used in the Cid at all, while in the Milagros it occurs in seven instances and is found fourteen times in the Santo Domingo. I mention these facts to show the lack of uniformity in its appearance in our texts. Considering, as the facts show, that Berceo used dennar currently in his poems, it seems strange that if he wrote the Alixandre, he allowed it to appear only once in all the 10,000 lines it contains. It will be seen from the examples following that dennar was particularly current in prayers to the Creator or to the saints for assistance. Its use was evidently quite restricted at this period and more affected by religious writings than those purely laical. No prepositional constructions are at hand for dennar.

- sy en algo pecaremos el nos deñe valer Alix 4

The pure infinitive is quite rare with pensar, the regular use being with de. The infinitives with a and por are found once each. Pensar with pure infinitive shows a great similarity to cuydar in the same use, although even here a subtle difference can be noticed. With de, however, there is more difference evident, and the pensar locution varies from a close approximation of cuydar to the sense mentioned by Menéndez Pidal¹

Pensat de almorzar, ca avredes lazdrado SLaur 104

In the last citation above pensar and pensar de are employed with no perceptible difference of meaning. In the citations from the Alixandre, however, the normal sense of pensar with pure infinitive is evident.

Without initial e this verb appears as sperar, also taking pure infinitive object. No prepositional uses occur. The two cases from the Crónica both come from the same page, and the use of the first may have caused the use of the second.

qual gualardon espera en cabo rresçebir Alix 1792

dubdar.

The pure infinitive with dubdar is rarer than the de-infinitive. The construction with en occurs once. The ethical dative in reflexive pronoun objects is not noted with dubdar and pure infinitive, though it is found with temer, a closely related verb. Four of the five examples following are taken from the Alixandre. All are negative.

- non dubdauan moryr Alix 497
 non dubdo esperarlo Alix 665
 non dubdauan morir Alix 1071
 su aver non dubdan con los pobres partir Alix 2314 non dubdan fer peccado Sig 42

temer.

The de-infinitive also appears with temer, though not so currently as the pure construction. The ethical dative reflexive so common in the passages of the de-infinitive with temer is rare with the pure use: temiendose de matarse uno a otro, Cron 466a15.

- non se temia caer Mil 547

OTHER VERBS WITH PURE INFINITIVE OBJECT

17. The verbs of this section are not unified in sense as are those of other groups. The idea of daring is present, however, in three (atreuverse, treuverse, osar), and that of beginning in two (comenzar, empeçar). Prepositional uses of the infinitive are more frequent here than the pure construction. Osar is the greatest exception to the versatility of the group, taking only the pure infinitive, and for this reason being classed sometimes as a modal auxiliary.¹

atendien el dia del plazo commo quien atiende salir de prision Cron 587b19

atreuerte.

The prepositions de, a and en are also noted with atreuerte and infinitive.

ni eran tantos que se atreuiessen salir Cron 104a37

non se ueyen conpanna de que az de si se atreuiesen fazer

auer mester.

Such locutions are much more common with de-infinitive.

non ouieron mester tomar afan Cron 727b24

çessar.

This verb more commonly takes de-infinitive.

non çessaré nunqua graçias a ti render Mil 545

començar.

This important verb takes the pure infinitive in 11 instances. Two of these are admittedly doubtful, there being possibility of absorption of the preposition a by a juxtaposed a, as suggested by Fitz-Gerald.¹ The difficulty is that proof for such voluntary omission seems impossible for these individual instances (see § 45):

començo muy afirmes al Criador rogar SDom 450

ante començo el la açada buscar SDom 726

It is true that absorption of a did take place in Old Spanish² but the fact that in the very poem offering the doubtful passages an instance of the pure infinitive occurs with començar, in which there is no possibility of absorption, since there is no juxtaposed a, indicates that to the author the a was not a necessary part of the començar construction:

començaron los monges las campanas tañer SDom 568

Fitz-Gerald notes this fact, but thinks that the prevalence of the a in contemporary use justifies our accepting the doubtful

² Fitz-Gerald, Vers. Cuad. Via, pp. 48–52.

instances as cases of absorption. It is evident, however, that if the author did not wish to use the preposition, there was no necessity for his so doing, since other texts offer several additional examples of the pure construction with no possibility of absorption:

- començo darle guerra Alix 402
 Començol mal traher con palabras yradas Alix 451
 Començol dar priesa Alix 685
 començaron guerrear luego Cron 219a6
 començo . . . guerrear a Aragon Cron 653b19
 començaron ordenar commo yrien cercar a Valencia Cron 605a46
 obras de piedad que començo y fazer Cron 684b32
 començo yr su uia Cron 741a50

It should be remarked as significant that five of these citations come from the Crónica, a prose text slightly later than Berceo. Thus neither was the construction with pure infinitive antiquated, nor was a here omitted for metrical reasons.

enpeçar (em-).

This verb is, like començar, much more common with de and a. Of these prepositions, a is much more frequently employed than de. Six instances of the pure infinitive are listed below, in three of which there is possibility of absorption of a (see § 45).

- Enpeçol el maestro al Infant demandar Alix 35
 enpeço . . . a todos maltraher Alix 2058
 enpieçan al cresuelo veylar los abezantes Alix 2529

ensayar.

Several examples of ensayar with de-infinitive occur.

- non . . . ensayaua fazer con ella nada Cron 626b42

guisar.

This verb is commonly used only as a reflexive. It then takes por, pora, and para with the infinitive in expressions of purpose. As a transitive, it is noted with pora-infinitive.

uos guise yo comer Cron 135b5

guisando mantenerle la Cron 539a19

mere(s)çer.

The pure infinitive is the most frequent with meresçer, though examples of the constructions with a and de occur. It is interesting that it is not noted at all in the Cid, and only once in the Alixandre.

non meresçe Mesopinia ser oluidado Alix 273

Non mereçen mis carnes iaçer tan viçiosas SOria 130

osar.

The most frequent verb of this section is osar. The only striking fact in its syntax is that its union with dependent infinitive is so close that no prepositional constructions are found. For this reason it is sometimes classed as a modal auxiliary (Diez and Menéndez Pidal so class it, but Meyer-Lübke and Otto omit it from their lists of auxiliaries).

non lo osaua catar Alix 36

treuerse (-v-).

This verb is treated as a modal auxiliary by Menéndez Pidal¹ because of its similarity to osar. Treuerse also takes a with the infinitive.

THE PURE INFINITIVE AS OBJECT OF FAZER, DEXAR, AND MANDAR

18. The infinitive is commonly considered as the object of fazer, dexar, etc. in such constructions as fizo lo quedar. Thus Meyer-Lübke treats it, and with him the majority of Romance scholars. Otto however, following Lücking, destroys the clarity of relation between fazer and infinitive by discussing a logical and a grammatical point of view, according to the first of which he takes the infinitive to be a predicate noun in relation to the direct object (generally a pronoun) of fazer. Whatever value this subtle complication may have in logic, it has none for this study. I shall, therefore, follow the generally accepted treatment of the phenomenon rather than the ingenious method of Lücking and Otto.

In Old Spanish the regular constructions of fazer and infinitive are fizo lo quedar and fizo les fazer cartas, according as one or two objects are present. Thus the personal object is generally direct if the infinitive has no object expressed, while it is indirect if such an object is present. Exceptions to this treatment will be considered later.

The problem of greatest interest in connection with the fazer group, which includes the verbs of sense perception (ver and oyr), is that of the indirect object of the agent, regular when the infinitive has an object as well as fazer. The theory formerly held was due to Tobler,¹ and has been supported by Meyer-Lübke, Körting, Brunot and others. This theory explains the indirect object of the agent with fazer and infinitive as due to analogy with the group of verbs taking a direct object of the thing and indirect object of the person. Thus for the French is cited as a parallel construction j'ordonne à mon ami de faire une démarche. The indirect is then considered as the normal form of this personal object, and the direct as a later deviation.

Muller² successfully combats this position, and shows that the dative here is to be traced back to a variety of the possessive dative in Latin. He quotes Lejay:¹ "Une variété du datif possessif est le datif de l'agent du passif. Il semble qu'à l'origine ce datif, joint à une forme quelconque du passif, n'était pas différent du datif dit d'intérêt." In this connection, compare the Classical Latin use of the dative of the agent in gerundive constructions such as mihi credendum est.

A summary of Muller's study follows:

The passive infinitive of transitive verbs was used in Folk Latin with facere (in the sense of jubere), with the verbs of sense perception, and with verbs of ordering. Examples:

Quatuor arietes occidi fecit, Vulg., Tob., 8, 22

Quorum facitis vota compleri, Epist. ad Justin., 10, 8, 2

Eum adduci jusserat, Passion. Leudgar., 1, 12

Consequently, the dative of the agent was employed with the passive infinitive in the above constructions:

Sic nos judicibus ipsum praeceptum relegi fecimus, Cod. Lon., t. IV, p. 259

Festivis diebus veniente ad ecclesiam populo fac eis praedicari verbum Dei, Vit. Vedast., 415

litteras . . . quas . . . de tribunali populis eas feceris adnunciari, Esp. Sagrad., t. V, p. 406

Et neque nobis neque ab heredibus nostris presens cartulam posse disrumpi, Muratori, t. II, dis. 6, 32, p. 475

With intransitive verbs, the passive infinitive not being available, the regular subject-accusative was used instead of the above dative of the agent.

Stare faciet alios, Vulg., Job, 34, 24

Ut pervenire facerent ad eum clamorem egeni, Vulg., Job, 34, 28

Et horis aliquot (animal) deambulare facies, Veg., Ars vet., I, 54

Muller shows (p. 41) that from about the beginning of the seventh century, the indistinct pronunciation of final un-accented vowels caused a confusion between the active and the passive forms of the present infinitive, so that out of the four conjugations, only the third presented even in written texts a distinct passive form. Thus amare-amari, monere-moneri, and finire-finiri became confused, and the active infinitive was substituted in these constructions, which formerly took the passive. But the passive sense still survived in the active form, as is evidenced by the fact that active and passive infinitive appear in the same passages in the same construction, the infinitive of the verbs of the first, second, and fourth conjugations standing in the active form and the infinitive of verbs of the third appearing in the passive, because here phonetic confusion was impossible (ducere-duci, occidere-occidi).

Gestorum veritas quae historiae inseri possit, ad plenum reperire non potest, Fred., 2, 49

Vel quicquid dici aut nominare potest, Marc. Form., II, 4, 77, 8

Nominibus nostris subseribi et confirmare jubemus, Esp. Sagrad., t. XL, p. 382

During the latter part of the eighth century the passive form of the infinitives of the third conjugation is also replaced by the active, though the sense remains unchanged (fieri, very significantly, is the latest passive form noted):

Fac fieri quod et ipse jubes miserere rogantis, Drac. Carm. 3, 618

Deprecans ut . . . facere ei jabissemus, Pardessus, 173, 129
Deinde quodquod volueris scapilatura facere fac, Murator., t. IV, Dis. 24, p. 683

After the disappearance of the passive infinitive, the dative of the agent is retained with the active infinitive, the passive sense still being felt:

Aperire fecit filiis matris viscera, V. Caes., I, 33 faciat nobis peccata nostra . . . cognoscere, Cap. R. F., t. II, n° 185, 5

Thus the personal indirect object in Romance constructions of the faire faire type is the survival of the dative of the agent employed in Folk Latin. The use of à with nouns and pronouns to indicate the indirect object is traceable to the general supplanting of the dative by ad at the time of the loss of case endings:¹

Ecclesia beati S. Petri qui ad me fundata est, C. L., t. V, 939, 695

In Old Spanish, as indeed in Modern Spanish, sentences like fizolo soterrar can be understood to have either active or passive sense in the infinitive (if active, lo would be the object of soterrar). At the present time probably a majority of conscious users of Spanish would not admit the passive force of the infinitive in the construction discussed by Muller. At what time the feeling for the traditional passive was lost, if it has indeed been lost, cannot be determined. A passive sense can, however, be most readily ascribed to the infinitive in phrases of the type fizolo soterrar. When the position of the object is after the infinitive (the object here being generally a noun, as in fizo fer armas), it often seems a violence to the construction to consider the infinitive as passive. In any case, the position of objects in the following citations permits rather of speculation as to probability, than of certainty, in the matter of active or passive sense in the infinitive. Since the infinitive is active in form, and our period so far removed from that of the passive infinitive in these constructions, it is usually possible to consider the sense, as well as the form, of the infinitive as active.

The most frequent position of the object is between fazer and the dependent infinitive. In this position, it seems to me, the infinitive may readily be felt as passive:

fízolos nonbrar Cid 1264

fiçieronlo damnar Duelo 72

Fizo todos los ninnos de Belleem matar Duelo 199

fizolo enforcar Alix 169

- fizo los huesos en vn fuego echar Alix 169

Also: Alix 666, 792, 857, 867, 889, 915, 1024, 1168, 1197, 1361, 1416, 1536, 1539, 1693, 1783, 1809, 1949, 2367, 2380, 2463, 2629; Sac 51, 68, 242; SDom 111, 332, 552, 559, 741.

The object also stands commonly between fazer and infinitive when the infinitive is intransitive:

- fizolo quedar Alix 492
 non fizolos seyer quedos Alix 499
 fizo a Lucifer en infierno caer SMill 100 Fizome . . . entrar SOria 149
 façeslas ir Himnos 3.1
 fizieron los foyr Alix 992
 fizieron los lazrar Alix 1413

Also: Alix 395, 590, 616, 618, 1278, 1554, 1786, 1808, 1858, 1904, 1991; SOria 149; Sac 163; SMill 250; SLaur 1; Loor 135.

Examples of the object preceding the fazer form, though not rare, are not so numerous as those just discussed. This position also lends itself easily to a passive interpretation of the infinitive:

- en vida nos faz juntar Cid 365
 lo farie colgar Alix 761
 lo fizo en ello comedyr Alix 2432
 el coral que los rrayos faze bien rreferir Alix 1454
 lo fizieron atar Alix 1695
 non se fazien temer Alix 1872
 Tu la hagas barrer Mil 177
 . . . ques fazie en el mar . . . traher Alix 1426

This position with intransitive infinitives is even more frequent than with transitives:

- non lo farian reyr SDom 89
 nos façen peccar Mil 121 me faga dios morir Alix 1765
 te fizó Dios de los reys nascer Loor 20
 dios te faga durar Alix 779
 el vos faga del mundo seyer enperador Alix 178
 los fizó quedar Alix 540
 Sagita que las nuues faz a ssy uenir Alex 1454

Also: Mil 351, 388, 396; Alix 104, 133, 351, 507, 819, 1046.

The position of the object most naturally used with active infinitive (fizo fer una capa) is comparatively frequent in our texts. The fact that with intransitive infinitive this position is quite rare helps to support the theory that the infinitive here actually takes the object. It is significant that all objects discovered in this position are nouns, and are perhaps placed after the infinitive in order not to break the close connection between it and fazer. This closeness of relation is hardly disturbed by the use of the pronoun between the two verbs (fizolo fer). Meyer-Lübke classes hacer as a modal auxiliary along with dexar, thus recognizing the close union of hacer and dependent infinitive.

- . . . por fer matar a Etor Alix 662
 Faz camiar tu nombre Alix 376
 fizó rrancar las tiendas Alix 755
 . . . que faga i cantar mill missas Cid 225
 fizó mio Çid fincar siete tablados Cid 2249
 Fizo en vna carta Dario fer la figura Alix 138

 Fizo aparellar toda la cleresçia Alix 1120
 faze purgar la fenbra Alix 1459
 Fizo prender dos grifos Alix 2461
 Fizo fer vna casa Alix 2462
 Fizo fer vna capa Alix 212
 fizó el rrey . . . poblar vna rrica çibdat Alix 2073

With intransitive infinitive:

- fare venir a Dario merçed a nos pedyr Alix 194
 fazen bolar las nuues Alix 686
 fazie . . . plorar a sus barones Alix 1770

Only the examples with one object are treated above. These are much more numerous than those having two objects. In the latter cases, the agent is made the indirect object, and the infinitive has a direct object definitely its own. There are so few examples available that little of value can be gained by a study of the position of the objects present, but it is interesting to observe the great variety of arrangements employed:

1. fazen les encorvar . . . las çeruizes Alix 2320
2. fizieselos quitar Alix 1568
3. fizieron lo ellos a los otros leuar Alix 1695
4. fizolo saber luego a sus adelantados Alix 826
5. yo le fare leuar el gato Alix 1270
6. nos faze a todos tan buen padre perder Alix 2619
7. carrera mala le fagamos tomar Alix 2421
8. el que se fazie dios a los omnes dezir Alix 1511
9. no lo pudieron fazer saber a los otros Cron 58a54

Of these arrangements, the first and second are much the most frequent, the others occurring only sporadically.

1. faze a las nodrizas auer leyte sobeja Alix 1459
 fazel oluidar la materia Alix 1789

5. Que li fagas cobrar lo que solie aver Mil 738
 nol pueden fazer comer un muesso de pan Cid 1032
 querrienle fer . . . pechar la molendura Alix 1342
 Cueyta me faz prender a mi esta carrera Alix 2407

There was little irregularity in the use of direct and indirect objects in the fazer construction in our texts. Confusion was encouraged by forms doing duty for either direct or indirect object (me, te, se, nos, vos, and a with nouns and pronouns). On the whole, the regularity of treatment is more remarkable than the exceptions thereto.

One object is present, indirect form:

- le fizo contorçer Alix 1046
 fizol amolleçer Alix 1840
 fazial prender biuo Alix 936
 fizieron les syn grado en las naues entrar Alix 618

Two objects are present, both direct in form:

Avn auie el rrey mucho mas que fablar,
 metieron todos bozes, fizieronlo la callar Alix 2273

El emperador anda por la fe guerrear,
 Quiere fer los christianos a Christo denegar SLaur 29

A clause may take the place of the passive object, the agent remaining indirect:

- Fizoles cuemo era la cosa entender Alex 539
 Fizieron le creyer que lo querien matar Alix 1881
 faz lo que a nos dizes a ellos entender Alix 1818

dexar, dessar.

This verb in general follows the treatment of fazer, described above. The pronoun object is found, however, somewhat more often preceding dexar (non se dexo caher, Alix 2071) than between dexar and infinitive, the prevailing position with fazer (fizolo fazer). Thus a very close union is observed between dexar and its dependent infinitive, for which reason Meyer-Lübke classes it as a modal auxiliary. Intransitive infinitives are found more often with dexar in our texts than transitives.

The object stands before dexar, infinitive transitive:

- quenlas dexe sacar Cid 1277
 nin nos desses perder Himnos 3.6
 non lo dexo enterrar Alix 169
 non se dexaua echar Alix 573
Asmaua . . . ques dexasen vençer Alix 722
 por vna mala fenbra se dexo forçar Alix 750
Por una çeresa se dexa despeñar Alex 1763

In the same position, infinitive intransitive:

- non lo dexa creçer Alix 764
 dios te dexe beuir Alix 20
 nolo dexo errar Sac 190
 non me dessa fablar Duelo 146
 no lo dexaron en su tienda estar Alex 1553
 asi me dexe a Espana pasar Alix 1767
 non se dexo caher Alix 2071

Also: Alix 148, 338, 584, 1918, 2252, 2287, 2397; Mil 581.

With the object standing between dexar and infinitive, transitive infinitives are particularly rare in our texts. These few instances are readily acceptable with passive interpretation of the infinitive (N.B. matar as the infinitive).

- dexan la pobleçer Alix 1848
 Desose matar Loor 91
 dexose en crux matar Loor 135
 Dexaronse matar SOria 81

The infinitive is intransitive:

- déxenvos andar Cid 897
 déxem ir en paz Cid 978
 dexóla crecer Cid 3273
 Dexemos al buen omne folgar en su posada SDom 113
 dessóse morir Duelo 108
 dessades vuestra Madre vevir Duelo 125
 non dexauan las porras seyer de vegar Alix 1737
 dexolo dios beuir Alix 1356
 dexarnos ha beuir Alix 2069
 Quiero dexar al rrey en las naues folgar Alix 2302
 dexase morir Alix 2367
 non dexaua las parras llegar a las figeras Alix 2527
 dexaronlo vivir Mil 156

The position in which the object (a noun) follows both verbs is rare:

- Dexó correr un canto Alex 557
 Dexó correr la lança Alex 663
 Non dexedes legar a vos otras compannas Duelo 174

One position affected by dexar, and lacking for fazer, is that in which the infinitive precedes both dexar and the object, thus giving the infinitive special emphasis:

- quedar non las dexauan Alix 258
 rogar non se dexaron mucho los mensageros SDom 117
 . . . que caer non nos dexe en mala temptaçion Sac 264
 morir se dexarie Alix 2539
 errar non las dexaban Mil 8

With two objects present, there is naturally not so great a variety of order shown by dexar as by fazer, as dexar appears only about one-half as often as fazer in all uses. The normal fazer type (fizoles echar suertes, Cron 20b38) is strangely lacking in dexar. The infinitive regularly stands last.

- non dexes a tus gentes tan grant daño prender Alix 597 Déssateme, sennora, los tus piedes tanner Mil 488
 sol non les dexauan la cabeça rrascar Alix 1077
 Asi me dexe dios mi voluntad complir Alix 1766

- Que me dexe en paz mi rencura decir Mil 769
 valia de vn dinero non li dexan lleuar Alix 1787
 A nos essa nos desse el Criador usar Mil 704
 nunca gela dixa . . . prouar Alix 2239
 . . . que nunca nos lo dexe ensayar nin sentir Alix 2401
 a los judios te dexeste prender Cid 347
 dexóslle prender al cuello Cid 3339
 dexosle manear todo a derredor Alix 116
 nunca dexarla quiso a otri tener Alix 2575

Exceptions to the use of direct and indirect objects are extremely rare:

- . . . nol dexassen beuir Alex 331
 non los dixa el miedo su derecho conplir Alix 2056

mandar.

The first position of the object (los manda echar, Cid 679), so common with dexar and fazer, is the least affected by mandar. In this position the infinitive is generally susceptible of passive interpretation. In the Cid, however, some instances of nouns standing before mandar may be considered as inversions of the position naturally assumed when the infinitive has the object (Mandó librar el canpo, Cid 3693). The inversion would then be made for the sake of the verse, or for emphasis.

- pregón mandó echar Cid 1187
 la quinta mandó tomar Cid 1216
 conducho nos mandó dar Cid 1409 Conduchos largos el rey enbiar mandava Cid 1972 lo mandara criar Mil 569
 lo mando todo far Sac 39

Also: Cid 679, 1878; Loor 89; Mil 233.

With intransitive infinitive:

- . . . quel mandasse fablar Alex 35
 a paso las manda yr Alix 74
 me mandas fincar SMill 61

Also: Alix 803; Mil 480; SDom 89, 341.

The second position of the object (mandaualo tomar, Alex 938) is found most frequently with mandar, as with fazer, and readily permits a passive interpretation of the infinitive.

With transitive infinitive:

- mandó mill marcos de plata a San Pero levar Cid 1285
 mandólo recabdar Cid 1482
 mandólo vedar Cid 2308
 mandédesle tomar Cid 3515
 Mando todas sus gentes . . . guarnir Alix 585
 mando . . . vegilias tener Alix 551
 mandaua tres ganados offrir Sac 73
 Mandolo luego prender Alix 169
 al rey Alixandre mandaualo tomar Alix 938
 mandola . . . destroyr e quemar Alix 1581
 mando al mensajero . . . rrica alбриcia dar Alix 1962
 mando las calentar Alix 2047
 mandó ella el ninnuelo levar Mil 565
 Mandól poner a letras Mil 577

Also: Cid 312, 1013, 1536; Alex 776, 779, 792, 938, 1670, 1681, 2049, 2072, 2091, 2154, 2200, 2270, 2274, 2367, 2404, 2584.

With intransitive infinitive:

- Mandólos venir a la corth Cid 1263
 a todos los sos estar los mandó Cid 2017
 mandáronle ir adelante Cid 2766
 mando lo yr SDom 19
 manda amj alla entrar SDom 341
 mando todos los monges uenjr al parlatorio SDom 447 Mandolis atender Mil 88
 mandolas seyer quedas Alix 963

Also: Sac 125; Alix 963, 1267, 1575, 1631, 1953; SMill 5; Loor 144.

The word order most naturally employed when the infinitive takes the object is especially frequent with mandar (mando traher el agua, SDom 394). This position of the object appeared less often than any other with fazer, while with dexar the number of instances was so small as to be negligible. The object here is found to be a noun in all the instances noted. This was probably quite as much a determining factor as any consciousness of the relation between infinitive and object, since the pronoun did not break the close connection of conjugated verb and infinitive object nearly so much as did the noun (mandaualo tomar and mando todos los monges uenjr, Alix 938 and SDom 447).

- Mandad coger la tienda Cid 208
 mandó veer sus yentes mio Cid 417
 Mandó partir tod aqueste aver Cid 510

 mando tañer las tronpas e feryr las bozinias Alix 1275
 mando prender . . . la su mesnada clara Alix 1328
 mando traher las parias Alix 2560
 mando fer el buen rey conçeio general Alix 2502
 mando alçar los fumos Alix 2444
 Mando poner la cadiella . . . Alix 1819
 mandó . . . façer muy grant foguera Mil 848
 Mandó tener a todos los dessa mayson SMill 189 .

A number of instances of mandar are noted with no object other than the infinitive expressed:

mando caualgar Alix 938, 1115, 1870

Mando ally cauar Alix 1152

Mando luego mouer Alix 1275

mandaua cridar que . . . Alix 2414 (que clause replacing object)

mandedes ensellar Cid 317

With two objects present, mandar shows several varieties of word order, the most frequent having both objects between mandar and its infinitive (thus permitting the infinitive to carry the rhyme):

mando luego a las compannas tomar sus armas Cron 71b49

mandoli tomar ordenes SDom 42

Mandástesme mover a Bavieca Cid 3513

mandaron les fazer cada unos sus sennales Cron 99b6

Mandádno'los ferir Cid 2364

THE PURE INFINITIVE WITH VERBS OF SENSE PERCEPTION

19. Muller shows that in Folk Latin these verbs received in general the same treatment as fazer, taking the passive infinitive, and with it the dative of the agent or ab with the ablative: videret exercitum . . . ab his cingi . . ., Esp. Sagrad., t. VI, p. 552.

The active infinitive is found later with passive sense: Et quidquid inibi Estiva conjugi meae habere videntur, C. L., t. V, 906, 504.

In this section will be treated only oyr and ver for Old Spanish. Menéndez Pidal¹ classes cuidar with ver and oyr. This verb is better treated, however, under the group dealing with the mental processes, since its sense is much closer to that of pensar and asmar than to that of oyr and ver. Oyr occurs but rarely in comparison with ver.

This verb conforms to the conditions stated above for fazer. All positions of the object are found with oyr, though in few instances each.

The object precedes oyr:

- las oy yo tanner SMill 487 sy lo oyestes contar Alix 344, 999
 sil ovientes contar Cid 2314

The object intervenes between oyr and the infinitive:

- oyeron las gentes de la fuente rretraher Atix 2137
 Oyeron un sonido del cielo desçender Loor 155; also Sac 125, 285

The object follows both verb forms in SDom 592, although here the infinitive is intransitive:

udio del buen confessor andar estos roydos

There are two objects present:

Odiemoslo dezir a los mas ançianos SMill 404

tu muert odi consejar a ifantes de Carrión Cid 2670

a Isayas creo que las oy decir Loor 96

Oyr is not infrequent without object, or with a que clause replacing the object:

Siempre oy decir que . . . SMill 121

si oyestes contar . . . SDom 187

oyo dezir por nuebas dessa enfermedat SDom 405

nunca fablar odiestes de otros tan arteros SDom 479

commo odredes contar Cid 684

como oyemos dezir Alix 2271

ver, veer, veder (u-).

The best example of infinitives used with ver is found in Cid 726-730:

Veriedes tantas lanças premer e alçar, tanta adágara foradar e passar,
 tanta loriga falssar e desmanchar,
 tantos pendones blancos salir vermejos en sangre, tantos buenos cavallos sin sos dueños andar

and in Cid 1966-1969:

¿ quién visto por Castiella tanta mula preciada,
 e tanto palafré que bien anda,
 cavallos grucessos e corredores sin falla, tanto buen pendón meter en buenas astas, etc.

In these passages the comparatively detached condition of the infinitives is conspicuous. This will also be evident in many of the examples following. The union of the infinitive object with oyr and ver was clearly much looser than with fazer, etc. This will be further brought out in the discussion of passages having two objects. It is likewise to be noted that transitive infinitives with ver are rare.

The object precedes ver:

Tres reyes veo de moros derredor de mí estar Cid 637
 quandol vieron assomar Cid 1393
 por que me veades lidiar Cid 1653
 tanto braço con loriga veriedes caer a part,
 . . . cavallos sin dueños salir a todas partes Cid 2406
 lo vieron entrar Cid 3107
 le veo lazrar Loor 89
 Todas estas mezquindades que te veo sofrir Loor 96
 los veyen groñir Alix 2049

Also: Cid 1141, 1645; SOría 86; Alix 449, 465, 673, 1230, 1330, 1859, 1975, 2042, 2049, 2165, 2234.

The object stands between ver and the infinitive:

Si viéredes yentes venir Cid 388
 Mala cueta es . . . fijos e mugieres veer los murir de fanbre
Cid 1179
 Veriedes cavalleros venir de todas partes Cid 1415
 veerme an lidiar Cid 1641
 Víolos venir Cid 2772
 uio al diçiplo seyer tan sin color Alix 34
 vio vna serpiente con dos aguilas lidiar Alix 390
 veo a Sant Martin cerca de mj estar SDom 695
 Veol por mi morir Loor 78

Other examples of this position: Cid 919, 1141, 1393, 1645, 1653, 2400, 2413; SOría 142; Alix 55, 524, 1091, 1397, 1824, 1967, 2071, 2203, 2210, 2366, 2468, 2469, 2568; SMill 357; SLaur 63; Loor 173, 179; Mil 279, 490, 598, 599, 600, 674; Duelo 48; Sig 19; SDom 393, 644.

The object stands after the infinitive (even here the transitive infinitive is rarely met):

Quando vido mio Çid asomar a Minaya Cid 919
 veriedes crebar tantas cuerdas Cid 2400
 visto venir a Díago e a Fernando Cid 2440
 . . . fasta que viesse venir sus primas amas a dos Cid 2770
 Vio arder la lámpada SMill 335
 Vedia correr sangre Duelo 49
 Vido sobir los angeles SOría 42

Also: Alix 2320, 2467; Loor 136, 210; Mil 592, 604, 734.

Ver and infinitive, when two objects are present, depart from the closely observed custom with fazer, etc. of making the agent the indirect object instead of the direct.

Veriedes cavalleros, que bien andantes son, besar las manos, espedirse de rey Alfons Cid 2159

Here the intervention of a que clause between cavalleros and besar may have made Veriedes cavalleros sufficiently independent so that the presence of the second object manos was neglected. The same condition is noted in Cid 1228, where barata is made the actual object of ver and the construction is split, both intended objects being made direct:

en el passar de Xucar i veriédes barata, moros en arruenço amidos bever agua

The Cid also apparently neglects the presence of se as an object, and makes the agent with ver direct, whether such an agent is personal or not:

Aquí veriedes quexarse ifantes de Carrión! Cid 3207
veriedes armarse moros Cid 697
veriedes . . . arrancarse las estacas e acostarse los tendales
Cid 2400

Accepted instances of regularity are noted in:

Todas estas mezquindades que te veo sofrir Loor 96
veye al proximo bien aver o litiçia Alix 2329

Even these are not entirely satisfactory as examples of regular treatment, since in the first case the personal object te, and in the second al proximo, can hardly be considered more definitely indirect in form than direct.

Thus out of 7 instances of ver and infinitive with two objects, it is shown that none is a perfect case of regularity according to the use of objects with fazer, while at least 5 are definitely exceptions to such use. It is evident, therefore, that ver had by this time departed considerably from the use of the group with which it had been associated in the Vulgar Latin period.

Doubtless this condition accompanied the looseness of construction that is to be noted in so many of the citations above. The dependence of the infinitive on ver being so slight as to permit whole clauses to intervene, a resultant laxness in the use of direct and indirect objects is only to be expected, since a consciousness of the principle involved would vary almost in proportion to the closeness of construction.

As the one object present, le is used in:

- El que manda todo esto por mi le veo lazarar Loor 89
 quandol vió venir Loor 44
 Veol por mi morir Loor 78
 quandol vieron assomar Cid 1393

The use of the personal a is interesting in Verán a las estrellas caer de su logar, Sig 19.

THE PURE INFINITIVE WITH VERBS OF PERMITTING AND FORBIDDING

20. The members of this group are in sense closely related to the fazer group just discussed. In syntactical treatment they resemble rather the verbs taking the ordinary construction of indirect object of person and direct object of thing: otorgouos lo yo, Alix 1590. There are not enough instances of any of these verbs, however, to permit any detailed study of them, since none occurs more than twice. Consentir alone is found with the regular two objects present. Dexa might well replace Lexa in Lexa estar, Cron 43b35. For the de-infinitive with this group, see p. 129.

comiendo la my madre servirla Alix 2599

consentir.

The prepositional infinitives with de and en are also noted with consentir.

non les consintie fer las cosas vedadas Mil 510

lexar (probably has the same provenience as dexar: see Körting, Lat. rom. Wörterbuch, 2910, 5491; Gröber, Arch. für lat. Lex., III, pp. 509, 510; Meyer-Lübke, Gram., p. 417).

The preposition de may introduce the infinitive with lexar.

THE PURE INFINITIVE WITH VERBS OF MOTION

21. Lachmund¹ discusses the pure infinitive with the verbs of motion thus: "Am reinsten hat sich der reine Infinitiv in seiner ursprünglichen Bedeutung und Stellung erhalten bei den Verba der Bewegung . . . Der Infinitiv steht hier zur Bezeichnung des Zwecks." Although a literal interpretation of the first statement would not be quite accurate, since the purest use of the pure infinitive is rather that of subject or object, at which times it most clearly shows its dual nature of noun and verb, in the main Lachmund's points are well made. Meyer-Lübke² shows that ire and venire could take the pure infinitive in Latin, and that thus used it expressed goal. From its current appearance with ire and venire, the most common verbs of motion, it spread to the other verbs of the group until in Old Spanish it became one of the most frequent of the infinitive constructions. Not merely were other intransitive verbs of motion affected, but also transitives (enbiar, derecer, guijar) and reflexives (adelantarse, leuantarse, etc.). By analogy with these, the pure infinitive might be used with such reflexives as trabajarse, where the concept of motion was figurative and remote. Goal is the function naturally ascribed to the infinitive with verbs of motion (see Lachmund and Meyer-Lübke above), since motion implies a goal; yet it should be noted that this concept delicately merges into that of purpose. A predominance of one or the other, however, is usually not difficult to sense (e.g. goal in Vayamos posar, Cid 1531, and purpose in descendio morar a los llanos, Cron 467b50. This purpose sense in the pure infinitive permits clausal dependence in such cases as descendio al Infierno supleitó rrecabdar, Alix 2311; Por entrar a la missa la confession façer, Mil 71; for instances with a, por, pora and para see pp. 159, 209, 233, 235. The same conditions are noted in these verbs with the a-infinitive, for the construction with a came gradually to replace the pure infinitive in these uses. Even at the period of our texts the class with a is considerably the larger, though all the common verbs of motion take both modes of expression (descender, entrar, exir, yr, tornar, venir, etc.). Probably the reason why the pure infinitive came to be abandoned by this group except with the most frequent verbs was the fact that the pure infinitive was not definite, while the construction with a was both definite and emphatic. Confusion was conceivable with the pure construction, but with a practically the only senses that could be expressed were the very ones associated with these verbs (goal and purpose).

² Gram. III, § 503.

(a) Intransitive Verbs

descender.

This verb also takes a, por and pora with the infinitive. More of purpose than of goal is expressed here:

descendio morar a los llanos Cron 467b50

entrar.

The infinitives with a, por, pora and para are also noted with entrar.

Ante que a las parias entremos resçebir Alix 2503

Entró el sacristano el sepulcro catar SMil 335

Entró fer oración el novio refrescado Mil 338

Al Criador rogar not infrequently depends on a goal clause:

- El padre cordoioso entró a su altar,
 commo era usado al criador rogar SDom 366
 Entró a la eglesia al Criador rogar SDom 425
 entro el ala iglesia, al Criador rogar SDom 300

exir.

The prepositions a and por are also found with exir and infinitive.

exien lo veer mugieres e varones Cid 16

The most frequent verb of motion in Old Spanish is yr. Mentioned by Meyer-Lübke along with venir as being the starting-point for the development of the pure infinitive with verbs of motion in Latin, it maintained, if it did not increase, the varieties of its usefulness. It occurs commonly in all texts and takes all the prepositions that express goal or purpose (a, por, pora, para). Menéndez Pidal, after pointing out that verbs of motion, now regularly requiring a preposition, were used in the Cid with pure infinitive, states that from indicating motion toward something ir came to express intention like querer. He further says that la manol va besar, Cid 369, is in sense identical with quisol besar las manos, Cid 265. From this point the yr construction becomes for Menéndez Pidal a useless paraphrase, because "no supone que el deseo deje de estar seguido de la realización del acto deseado, sino generalmente lo contrario."¹

The main steps in the weakening of yr are well brought out by Menéndez Pidal, but the statement that the yr construction becomes a useless paraphrase, which he also remarks for querer, mandar, fazer, tornar and others, appears too sweeping to be valid. According to this point of view it would seem that, as soon as an infinitive construction becomes especially frequent, it degenerates into uselessness. The difference between complete and almost complete disappearance of sense in yr with infinitive is probably just the difference between almost complete and complete accuracy in Menéndez Pidal's remark. Why should not some slight sense of yr remain in even the weakest of its uses? The same scholar says that vayamos caualgar is equivalent to cavalguemos, and vayades passar to passedes.¹ A similar and quite as current a construction is at hand in the French allons chanter. But allons chanter is not exactly equivalent to chantons any more than vayamos caualgar is exactly equivalent to cavalguemos. If nothing more, vayamos and allons give an emphasis, a force, an inception to the action that is quite lost in the simple imperative. If the language were to be denuded of such expressions as this, in which the original strength has been largely lost, many fine and delicate shades of thought would have to go with them because of the lack of an appropriate vehicle. The above is not intended as a criticism of Menéndez Pidal's main points, but merely as a suggestion against a too literal interpretation of his statements concerning equivalence.

It is interesting to note that andar, which is in modern times naturally associated with yr, does not occur with pure infinitive object in the texts studied, and only rarely with a.

The presence of the reflexive pronoun with normally intransitive verbs of motion is to be occasionally remarked (cf. Cid 772: El rey Fariz en Teruel se fue entrar).

The pure infinitive is found with llegar only once, while the prepositional constructions with a and pora are not infrequent. Llegar had a successful rival in uuiar which took the pure infinitive regularly and with approximately the same sense (cf. uuiar below). There may be absorption of a by ayudar in this case:

llego ayudar a sacar el cuerpo (ref. lost)

pasar.

Other infinitive constructions of pasar have a, por and pora. It is not frequent in any construction.

pasaron veer los de la otra parte Cron 766b11
sal(1)ir.

The most noteworthy fact concerning salir is the predominance of the locution salir recibir. Other infinitives are rare. This locution also occurs commonly with a. In general use salir takes a, por and pora with its infinitive.

The prepositions a, por, pora and para are found with tornar and infinitive. Menéndez Pidal states¹ that "tornar no expresa, como propiamente debiera, un sentido iterativo, y no da matiz alguno especial al verbo simple." Exception might be taken to the words "como propiamente debiera" (since tornar may express to turn or to return to the doing), and to "no da matiz alguno . . ." The same reasoning applies to tornar as to yr above, concerning which Menéndez Pidal says approximately the same thing. The iterative sense is clear in Cron 270a5: pidiol quel diesse caualleros con que tornasse otra uez lidiar con aquellos reuellados.

(h) uuiar, vuiar.

This verb, as an intransitive, is a rival of llegar with infinitive, and is assigned the sense of the latter by Menéndez Pidal.¹ Like llegar it also takes the infinitive with a (cf. French related locution arriver à with infinitive). Like mouer, it is also used as a transitive and reflexive (in the sense of to aid, etc.). It is a notable fact that only the Alixandre and the Crónica yield examples of uuiar and infinitive. In instances such as apenas lo uuiauan saber aquellos contra que yuan ni apercebir se dello, Cron 45b40, it is evidently the infinitive that takes the object, and not uuiar, in spite of the juxtaposition of the latter.

- el no la uuio acabar ante de su muert Cron 9b13

venir (u-).

As mentioned above, venire shared with ire the distinction of being the starting point of the infinitive construction with verbs of motion. In Old Spanish these two verbs are still the most frequent and representative members of their group. Considerably less weakening of sense is to be noted in venir with infinitive than in yr, discussed above. The essential difference between the two verbs was not always rigidly observed however.¹ The prepositional constructions with a, por, and pora are found with venir.

(b) Transitive Verbs

In Otto's study, these verbs do not form a group by themselves. It seems evident, however, that to make the groups already treated under the pure infinitive object absorb even these few verbs would be doing violence to the syntactical uses of those groups. With the following verbs the infinitive expresses clearly the concept of goal, a concept which in some instances merges into that of purpose, but which is quite distinct from that of object with verbs of wishing, permitting, etc., etc. There may be two objects present, as in the fazer group, but there is always this concept of goal to be felt, which is entirely lacking in the fazer construction. Thus the function of the infinitive with these transitives is found to be the same as with the intransitives just discussed (e.g. goal being equally evident in enuiaronlo dezir, Cron 374a17, and in vayamoslos ferir, Cid 676).

The verbs of this group also take a, pora and para with the infinitive. Pora and para give an increased sense of purpose or goal, but a adds little not already present in the pure infinitive (Enbio end poderes . . . conqueryr Capadoçia, Alix 821; quando alguno enuiauan a conquerir tierra, Cron 24b1; . . . quel enbiassen ballesteros et peones pora combater a Valencia, Cron 576a22). The prepositional construction is more frequent with these transitive verbs of motion than that without preposition.

Pora-infinitive also occurs with aiudar, but the most frequent construction has a. Possibility of absorption of a is to be noted in these two cases:

Si Dios nos aiudara fer una remembranza Duelo 44
si aquel fecho le ayudassen acabar Cron 584b14

derecer.

The possibility of a embedida in this example is also evident (though no cases of derecer a with infinitive are at hand):

tan bien me dereçeste mi cosa acabar Alix 2563

enbiar (emb-, env-, enu-).

This is the most current verb of the transitive class. The basic concept of goal imperceptibly merges into that of purpose (enuiolo dezir a su hermano, Cron 251a52, and los enuio Cristo semnar la bendicion, Sac 41). Generally more of purpose is to be felt than of goal, however. The locution enbiar dezir is especially common without specific agent and with the passive object (often lo, referring to something already mentioned) standing between enbiar and the infinitive: Pues que el ouo esto fecho enbiolo dezir a Alhacan, Cron 351b41. Enbiar also takes a, por and pora with the infinitive.

Enbio end poderes . . . conqueryr Capadoçia Alix 821

Enbio sue fazienda dezir a castellanos SMill 413

Embio un su omne . . . Aduçir los vestidos SDom 482

Envio dos calonges . . . Probar esto Mil 568

Embio esso mismē decir a alaveses SMill 414

enuiaronlo assi dezir a Theoderico . . . Cron 243a46

enuio el rey Amalarigo dezir all emperador . . . Cron 251b25

enuiaronlo dezir a Bernaldo Cron 374a17

enuiaronlo dezir al rey Cron 375a25

Also: Cron 251b52, 329a16, 380a39, 380a52, 381a8, etc.

guiar.

This is a normal transitive verb of motion, demonstrating the element of goal more clearly than enbiar. Only two instances of the verb with pure infinitive occur, however, and both come from the Milagros. No prepositional occurrences of guiar with infinitive are noted in these texts.

nos guie fer cosas por ond salvos seamos Mil 582

El que guió a Judas façer el mal mercado Mil 871

mouer.

The regular construction of mouer is with a. Its use is as transitive, intransitive and reflexive with that preposition. In the following instance, the first a is evidently the personal accusative sign, but may have influenced the omission of a just before the infinitive.

mouio a este Yuçaf Abentexefin passar a Espanha Cron 557a23

(c) Reflexive Verbs

Reflexive verbs of motion as a class, when taking the infinitive to indicate the goal or the purpose of an action, usually take the prepositional constructions rather than the pure infinitive. The connection of finite verb and infinitive is not felt to be as close as with yr, venir, etc. Purpose, rather than goal, is the predominating function of the infinitive. In the citations below, all from poetical works, the preposition may have been voluntarily omitted for metrical reasons, the pure infinitive and that with a being sufficiently equivalent with such verbs.

adelantauase Simacus el colpe rresçebir Alex 1998

levantarse.

Infinitive constructions with a, de, por and pora are also found.

Levantose est monge rezar la matinada,

Tanner a los matines, despertar la mesnada,

Enderezar las lampadas, allumnar la posada Mil 288

trabaiarse.

More frequent infinitive constructions with de, por and en are noted with trabaiarse.

rogar te quiero . . . que tu non te trauages tanto me persegjur SDom 696

vezarse.

The constructions with de and a are also found. Absorption of a may have been operative in this instance:

THE INDEPENDENT PURE INFINITIVE

22. Meyer-Lübke¹ gives three classes of propositions in which the infinitive is the only verb present; interrogative, exclamatory, and imperative propositions. The reason for the lack of a finite form of the verb is that the person speaking is thinking in very general terms, and not of one individual as such; hence he employs the general form of preposition, as in Pourquoi pleurer? Why weep? Such sentences usually have the value of negative propositions, Pourquoi pleurer? meaning that there is no cause for weeping.

Diez¹ states that the independent infinitive can be used in lively discourse, to give rapid orders, summon help, etc. Thus the speaker gets to the goal of his thought more quickly than if the personal form were used. Meyer-Lübke mentions the same classes of independent infinitive propositions as Diez.

The historical infinitive of Latin is said by Diez to have no application in the Romance languages. Only French knows an analogous construction, where the rapid beginning of an action is expressed by de with the infinitive. Diez considered that these were not cases of ellipsis, but resulted from the natural tendency to substitute the prepositional for the pure infinitive. This point of view is interesting because Luker² in his Columbia University dissertation on the historical infinitive in French, has brought a considerable body of evidence together to prove just the contrary, viz. that ellipsis is the process involved in the French construction, and that the frequency of use of penser de in the required senses justified the omission of penser.

Our texts offer so few examples of the independent infinitive in any of the categories mentioned by Diez and Meyer-Lübke that they may be considered as highly sporadic. Mil 889 offers a case closely resembling the historical infinitive:

Fueron luego venidos grant turma de peones,
 Entraron en la iglesia, trovaron los ladrones,
 Manetraeronlos luego commo vinien fellones,
 Darles grandes feridas con muy grandes bastones.

Menéndez Pidal's remark for the Cid might be extended to include our other texts as well: *Se rechaza del Cantar el uso del infinitivo con valor de imperativo.*³ In Alix 2435 (Morel-Fatio) appears, however, the infinitive guardarte, rendered by Janer in Alex 2293 as the imperative form guardate:

Quieres toller del mundo vna grant claredat, quieres tornar a Grescia a grant tenebredat,
traydor, por que amas tan fiera maluestat?
guardarte que non fagas con Belsus hermandat!

The infinitive in exclamations is illustrated by Sac 75:

Torno a sus discipulos que sedien en ardura, Confortolos e dixoles ¡ Dormir, auet folgura !

and in Duelo 178–190, occurs the unique refrain eya velar! with both exclamatory and imperative force:

- Cantica.* Eya velar, eya velar, eya velar.
 178. Velat aliam de los iudios, eya velar:
 Que non vos furten el Fijo de Dios, eya velar.
 179. Ca furtarvoslo querran, eya velar:
 Andres e Peidro et Iohan, eya velar.
 180. Non sabedes tanto descanto, eya velar:
 Que salgades de so el canto, eya velar.
 181. Todos son ladronciellos, eya velar:
 Que assechan por los pestiellos, eya velar.
 182. Vuestra lengua tan palabrera, eya velar:
 A vos dado mala carrera, eya velar, etc., etc.

THE PURE INFINITIVE DEPENDENT ON RELATIVE PARTICLES, ETC.

THE INFINITIVE DEPENDING ON THE RELATIVE AND INTERROGATIVE PRONOUNS

23. Meyer-Lübke¹ in discussing the infinitive with the relative and interrogative pronouns states that all the Romance languages have equivalents of non habeo quod with infinitive. French is said to add de after mistaking que for the conjunction, e.g. si n'i ot que de l'avaler. But the construction is much more common in the West. Meyer-Lübke cites examples having the infinitive dependent on por do, como and donde, as well as que. In explaining the phenomenon of the infinitive with the relative, he takes the Italian Non ho que mangiare, which he considers as a fusion of Non ho que mangi and Non ho a mangiare. Stress of emotion is blamed for the loss of grammatical correctness.

Menéndez Pidal¹ remarks on this subject: “Además del verbo, también rige infinitivo sin preposición el relativo, ó la partícula interrogativa. El infinitivo se halla en vez del subjuntivo, no sólo tras ‘que’ . . . sino tras ‘quien’.”

Diez adds that the infinitive in these phrases is “complexif,” i.e. it is construed immediately with the relative or interrogative particle, but can refer to a direct object preceding, as in buscais mentiras que decir, teneis dineros que gastar, etc. Diez finds the only difference between non so que fare and non so fare questa cosa to be the order of words. According to him, the infinitive depends on the finite verb, and the relative or interrogative comes to separate the two. There is no ellipsis of a verb in a finite mode, on which the infinitive could depend. Diez finds the construction of early Vulgar Latin origin, giving various examples such as non habent quid respondere, etc.

The popularity of the infinitive so employed became strong in the West, as remarked by Meyer-Lübke. This is especially true of Old Spanish where the variety of its uses is quite striking. Otto, for the Portuguese of Camões, does not discuss in detail the cases he notes, but cites about twenty illustrations of the principle, practically all of them being with que. The other relatives and interrogatives were evidently either lacking or extremely rare. Old Spanish offers a much richer field, with greater latitude in the choice of the determining particles, and with fewer restrictions in the circumstances of their use.

(a) Que with Various Verbs

Several verbs are found with the relative and interrogative particle que taking the infinitive form, chief of which verbs is auer. Though current in most of the texts of this period, ¹ Cid I, § 160, [5]. See also Hanssen, Gram., p. 254.

auer que occurs less often in the Cid than saber que with infinitive. Sometimes there is the double object construction, as noted by Diez: Tant avien que veer en esta pestilencia, SMill 210, but this is by no means as common as that without the second object. The element of necessity gradually comes to be noticed in the locutions auer que and tener que, when the origin of the constructions has been forgotten (see auer, auer a and auer de with infinitive object, expressing necessity, etc.).

auer (see auer, Cid II).

Diez remarks the prevalence of saber with the interrogative pronoun and infinitive. Meyer-Lübke makes special mention of the negative of saber, where the emotion of the speaker is made to account for the use of the general form of the verb instead of the specific and finite form: thus in English I don't know what to do! instead of I do not know what I should do. Examples of the positive saber que with infinitive are extremely rare. The use of the ethical dative se is noted frequently. The infinitive in all cases is found to be far, fer, or fazer, thus paralleling the English expression cited above.

- Non sabia con grant ira que fer el diabladlo Mil 361

(b) Prepositions with que and the Infinitive

In contrast with the Portuguese of Camões, and probably surpassing the other Romance languages in freedom of employment, Old Spanish offers quite a number of prepositions used with que and infinitive. There is a sufficient group of examples to indicate that the construction was a well recognized one, including the six prepositions a, con, de, en, por and sobre. The preposition is evidently determined by the infinitive following, as in sobre que contender, en que trauar, a que se tornar, etc. Por que is noted most frequently, and because of this fact comes later to be felt as a unit.

- non auian a que se tornar Cron 571a50

Cron 492a17
 non auien de que comprarlo Cron 588a17

en.

The three examples of en que with infinitive show trauar as determining the preposition. They are found in the Crónica only.

- por que non le ayan los omnes en quel trauar Cron 419a39
 deuedes . . . catar que non fagades cosa que uos ayan los omnes en que trauar Cron 421b28 non fallan los omnes buenos que en las sus barraganias fallen sobre.

Contender causes the use of sobre with que in these two instances:

- Quiero my firmamiento ante todos poner que despues non ayades sobre que contendier Alix 2598
 . . . por que non ouiessen sobre que contendier Cron 367b30

OTHER RELATIVE AND INTERROGATIVE PARTICLES THAN QUE

24. The high favor in which infinitive constructions were held in Old Spanish is evidenced by their frequency of use with relatives and interrogatives other than que. The most striking fact in this connection is the variety of prepositional modification noted: a don, por do, por o, con qui, a quien and con quien, all with the infinitive.

There is a causal force in como with the infinitive in Cron 70b27: entendieron que aquella batalla cibdadana era, e mas que cibdadana como seer ellos todos parientes unos con otros. Otherwise, como is used with infinitive as the second member of the comparative construction tanto . . . como (positive degree). The comparative degree, mas . . . que, likewise takes the infinitive: querien mas moryr que beujr aontados, Alix 1405.

The use of tanto . . . como (Eng. tantamount to) in definitions is illustrated in the last two citations below.

RELATIVE AND INTERROGATIVE ADJECTIVES WITH SUBSTANTIVE AND INFINITIVE

25. Neither Otto nor Dittes gives any instances of this construction for the Portuguese of Camões and for Old Provençal. At least two cases are at hand from the Crónica:

- non sabien todos que onrra le dar por ello Cron 325b8
 non sabien a qual parte yr buscarlas Cron 610a29

THE COMPARATIVE QUE WITH INFINITIVE

26. A notable resemblance is remarked between the infinitive with the comparative que and that with the relative and interrogative pronouns. In both cases the speaker chooses the most direct means of expressing his thought, instead of using the more precise finite form of the verb. Of course, if the verb after the comparative que has a different subject from that of the first clause, there is hardly any choice for the speaker, i.e. the finite verb is regularly used: Mas quiero io sennera seer embergonzada Que tanta buena duenna sea desamparada, Mil 566.¹ Confusion of two thoughts is readily seen in the frequent use of the intrusive non (French ne) after the comparative que: mas querien morir ya que non ueuir en aquel crebanto, Cron 464b12. In our examples, this intrusive non occurs slightly more often than the more logical positive, especially in the prose Crónica. Querer is by far the most frequent verb of the first clause, valer being the only other one appearing at all currently. As variants for mas, the regular first member of the comparative group, are noted ante and antes as well as the comparatives mayor and mejor: quisieron ante seer quemados que morir a manos de los romanos, Cron 50a16, and mejor me sera esso que beuir en peccado, SDom 52. In Alex 2362, a appears unexpectedly with the infinitive: mas les valdrie que fuesen por naçer . . . que tal vida a veyer. En is used in both members in Alex 1251: mejor abinie en armas menear que en dezir rrasones nin en consello dar.

PART II

THE PREPOSITIONAL INFINITIVE

THE INFINITIVE WITH DE

27. Diez states that Latin offers no examples of the use of prepositions with the infinitive,¹ and that when so found in Romance the combination takes the place of the Latin gerund or gerundive. He finds in the scribes' Latin of the late Vulgar Latin period various interesting cases of the infinitive with preposition, of which the following are representative: ad scribere tolli, cepit ad vendere, ad habitare aut lavorare, etc. These show an increasing usefulness of the infinitive, and forecast the conditions later prevailing in the Romance languages. As soon as the infinitive was considered capable of use with a preposition, its field could be extended almost indefinitely, restricted only by the limitations of the prepositions themselves. Diez further remarks that the preposition de had its meaning more weakened than any other preposition.² It was only a natural development when the infinitive took the place of a noun in normal noun locutions with de, as when, instead of saying vengo de Madrid they said vengo de ver Madrid. These instances are numerous, but undoubtedly the de-type most influential on the later growth of infinitive usefulness was the de in the sense of concerning, about, in the matter of, relative to, called by Meyer-Lübke the relative de.³ This is the particular sense of de that shows itself weakened to such a point that it is sometimes almost impossible to see even a vestige of its original meaning left. But in most doubtful instances the rendition of de by one of the above approximate equivalents will not be conspicuously out of place, e.g. in such expressions as me duele de, me cale de, fermoso de, dulce de, enpeçar de, pensar de, etc. All uses taken together, the de-infinitive gained gradually in popular favor until it surpassed both the pure and the a-infinitives. Thus our texts yield about twenty verbs with de-infinitive subject, and forty with de-infinitive object, as well as adjective and noun constructions not found with the pure infinitive. It is especially significant that the de-infinitive could hold its own in the field of infinitive subjects and objects, since here were territories that would normally stand firm for the pure infinitive. It seems so much more natural to get to the objective of the action of the finite verb without introducing a comparatively foreign prepositional sense (comienço dormir, meresco seer enperador, temia perder el reyno). But the relative de was so fitting with many verbs (pensar de, acordarse de, apresurarse de, etc.), and de could so readily indicate the origin or the object with other verbs (considered by Meyer-Lübke the starting-point of the spread of de-objects, according to Gram. III, § 386) as with començar, cesar and the like — while the various senses of de were so delicately shaded one into another — that de came to be more and more pervasive in infinitive constructions where its use was far from traditional. Its sense was of course weakening all this time, since it could not be employed with such varied verbs if its force remained at all constant (e.g. aborrecien de oyr fablar . . . Cron 135b36; aprende de dar tu cuerpo a los omnes, Cron 113a24; assacaron de fazer un beuer, Cron 30a45; buscaron de echarlo, Duelo 70, etc.). It came, then, to be more or less a handle of the infinitive that could be utilized with most verbs taking an infinitive object. There were some that remained true to the pure infinitive, such as the modal auxiliaries and the members of the fazer group, because here the action of the infinitive was quite immediate to the action of the conjugated verb, but most of the other verbs taking the pure infinitive object felt the encroachment of the de-infinitive. The special group of de-infinitive objects with verb phrases of the type tener en coraçon, auer en uso, escoger por mejor, etc. are of interest, as they form a considerable body of useful expressions in which the de-infinitive has largely departed from its traditional relative sense, and successfully invaded a pure infinitive field. It is significant that these expressions are noted only in the Crónica, i.e. that in the period between the Cid and the Crónica the use of the de-infinitive had rapidly increased. In this group, the action of the infinitive was not felt as immediate to that of the main verb, and the infinitive needed the slightly introductory force of the de (no tenie en coraçon de numqua tornar, Cron 39b36; ouieron et tomaron los cristianos en uso de dezir . . . Cron 361a3).

Other functions of the de-infinitive are found coming from traditional senses of the preposition. Thus the de-infinitive may indicate direction from (venir de, tornarse de, despertar de, levantarse de, etc.), the cause of an action (alabarse de, enoijarse de, castigarse de, etc.), and the means or manner of an action (adobar de, gozarse de, etc.). Its use with adjectives and nouns, though not traditional, becomes one of its important functions (graue de uencer, Cron 161b21; fermosa de catar, Cron 146b38; tiempo de casar, Cron 22a34; seso de fablar, Mil 691, etc.). All these constructions will be considered later.

THE DE-INFINITIVE AS SUBJECT WITH SER AND AN ADJECTIVE OR ADVERB

28. It is an interesting fact that Otto¹ finds no cases of the de-infinitive acting as the subject of a verb in Camões. This would indicate that the field of the de-infinitive had not been extended so far in Portuguese as in Spanish, though the discrepancy in period and school prevents accurate comparison. In Old Spanish this construction is indeed quite common, though only one case occurs in the Cid (cómmo vos plaze de far, Cid 670). The Crónica is particularly prolific in examples of the de-infinitive as subject.

Under the immediate class with ser and an adjective or adverb, the following examples may be cited:

- Luengo serie de todo quanto que vio contar Alix 2471

THE DE-INFINITIVE AS SUBJECT WITH SER AND SUBSTANTIVE

29. The subgrouping of instances of the de-infinitive as subject into those used with ser and an adjective or adverb, and those with ser and a substantive, is for convenience of comparison with Otto's work for the Portuguese rather than for any value that such grammatical subtleties may be fancied to have. The difference is negligible between guisado es de fincar, Cron 609a30, and sera guisada cosa de no caer, Cron 74a18, as far as concerns the function of the infinitive. The Crónica again yields a great majority of cases of de-infinitive as subject.

THE DE-INFINITIVE AS SUBJECT WITH THE IMPERSONAL VERBS

30. The de-infinitive as subject is considerably more frequent than the pure infinitive with the impersonal verbs (cf. §12 above). Among the verbs taking both the pure and the de-infinitive as subject are noted abondar, caer, conuenir, pertenecer, plazer and semeiar. Impersonal constructions of the type es forzoso, es posible, are treated in §28 under ser and an adjective or adverb. These expressions are comparatively rare, with the exception of es bueno, es bien, es mejor, es malo, and es guisado. Although the Crónica furnishes most of the available instances of the de-infinitive with impersonal verbs, the other texts employ this construction from time to time.

This verb appears with pure infinitive also.

¿ e como non abonda all emperador de dar sus quitaciones a los caualleros cristianos? Cron 274b43 acaesçer.

acaesçiol de posar en las casas dell obispo Cron 712b2

auer pro.

The pure infinitive also occurs with caer.

cayo por suert a la reyna Lampeto de fincar en la tierra et mantener el regno et deffender le Cron 219a46

non me cae a mi de uos conseiar Cron 732b44

nos cae aqui agora en razon . . . de contar aqui como fue aquella contienda Cron 673b22 conuenir.

The pure and a-infinitives are also found with conuenir. De is noted only in the Crónica.

conuiene de guardarnos Cron 286b40

les conuinie de yr se Cron 318b17

conuiene aqui de fablar en el linage de los reyes Cron 467b32

pertenecer.

The pure infinitive subject is likewise used with pertenecer.

a quien pertenesce de guardar el regno Cron 723a18

como quier quel pesaua de yr ell con tales nueuas Cron 498b25

plazer.

The pure infinitive is also found as subject with plazer.

dezidme, cavalleros, cómmo vos plaze de far Cid 670

plezralis de oilla Mil 215

plazria asus parientes de ueerla transida SDom 680

les plazia de complir quanto les auie dicho Cron 590b23

semeiar.

The pure infinitive is also found as subject with semejar. In such a case as Cron 45a52 it is clear that the de-infinitive is acting as the predicate rather than as the subject of semeiaua: e por end les semeiaua de seer destroyda una uez, e que sacassen de sos coraçones la manziella de Carthago para siempre. The similarity in sense between this de-infinitive construction and that with ser is conspicuous: Sennor, tu los connoçes quales son de sacar, Duelo 102. The mutual dependence on semeiaua of the de-infinitive and the que clause with the subjunctive is also to be remarked.

Pero razon semeia, maguera que tardemos,

De contarvos los signos SMill 377

les semeiaua grieue cosa de seruir nin obedescer a otri Cron 354a34

non me semeia guisado de uos yr conseiar Cron 497b40

Cron 686a27

menester les era de conseio tomar Alix 1953

tener pro.

¿ que pro te tiene de te matar assi? Cron 442a40

venir (u-).

An interesting group of locutions having de-infinitive subject was based on venir as a common element. These locutions have notably diverse senses according to the noun used with venir. Coraçon is particularly frequent, as it is likewise in related object locutions with tener and auer (ouo muy mas a coraçon de yr contra el, Cron 132a24). Neither the pure infinitive nor any preposition other than de is noted with venir in this impersonal construction.

venir a coraçon.

THE DE-INFINITIVE AS PREDICATE NOUN

31. Only two instances are at hand of the de-infinitive as an ordinary predicate noun. In the second of these it will be seen that the de gives a certain introductory force needed by the unattached fincar:

el saber dell arte de geometria, que es de medir Cron 3b3 ca profession fazer el frayre, es renunciar el mundo, esto es, quel dexa para siempre, et de fincar en la orden otrossi por siempre Cron 692a3

Within the territory of the predicate infinitive is found, however, the important de-infinitive locution with ser. Menéndez Pidal¹ finds ser with de-infinitive only once in the Cid, though it is current elsewhere (esto sea de vagar, Cid 380). He also calls attention to the fact that ser de is the passive, in actual use, of auer de. Otto takes little note of the Portuguese² ser de, merely pointing out that it corresponds to the Latin ad-gerund (ad credendum) or the genitive of the gerundive. He expresses surprise, however, that a with the infinitive does not occur here instead of de. In Old Spanish both prepositions are common, though de is slightly the favorite. This is quite the contrary of the situation found in auer a and de with the infinitive, as here the a construction is many times more frequent.

Other examples of the de-infinitive with ser will be found in: Sac 163; Loor 119; Sig 10, 69; Mil 141, 488, 601, 703, 867; SDom 153, 177, 570; SMill 109, 150, 487; Alix 1457, 1732, 2094, 2098, 2467, 2624, etc.

THE DE-INFINITIVE OBJECT AND THE RELATIVE DE

32. Meyer-Lübke¹ shows the union of the infinitive object with the conjugated verb by means of the preposition de to have been of Romance creation, yet to date back to that formative period, the processes of which to a large extent are still shrouded in conjecture. He considers the point of departure, from which the use of de spread to numerous verbs not normally taking it according to their sense, to have been with those verbs that could equally well take the de of origin or of object, such as començar and cesar. Another group assisting in the spread of de was that of verbs taking the indirect object of the person, and the de-infinitive object of the thing, such as prometer, ordenar, etc. It should be emphasized, however, that the most important cause of the rapid increase in the use of de was the fact that its sense permitted such weakening as to make it eventually serve more as a slightly significant introductory particle to the infinitive than as a real entity in the meaning of the sentence. And the sense of de that permitted such weakening was the relative de (i.e., relative to, concerning, about, in the matter of), that could be used so naturally with a large number of verbs (pensar de, asmar de, aventurarse de, dubdar de, etc.). Even with the verbs meaning to begin and to cease, this relative de was quite appropriate (en-peçar de fablar, to begin in the matter of speaking). It was such a delicate prepositional sense that it crept inconspicuously into use with numerous verbs not readily attracting the de of origin, etc. Even with verbs normally taking the de of cause or means it is sometimes possible to consider the relative de as operative (gozarse de, to enjoy oneself by means of, because of, or in the matter of something). This shows the problem to be more subtle than profitable. The important fact is that this de-construction, by reason of its variously useful connotations, came to replace the pure infinitive to a very large extent, and even to encroach on the territory of the a-infinitive normally indicating goal. This was particularly true of the verb object class, where it was quite possible to view the relation of infinitive to verb in several manners, and where the prepositional construction was indeed a substitute for the object relation rather than that relation itself. Thus in the object group at least the following verbs are found with both de and a: aprender, cobdiçiar, començar, cometer, conpeçar, dexar, enpeçar, esforçar(se), mereçer, pensar and usar. The a usually indicates the place or goal of the action, i.e. place at which or to which (esforçarse a, començar a, etc.), while the de, as explained above, is prevailingly the relative de. Of these two prepositions de was used much more generally than a in the object group, but after this period, in which analogy operated most freely in causing various prepositions to be tried out with a given verb, the genius of the individual verb asserted itself in the fixing of its prepositional construction: a with començar, en with pensar, the pure infinitive with mereçer, de with dexar in the sense of to cease, etc. It should also be noted below that the relative de-infinitive is equally at home with transitive, intransitive and reflexive verbs, and that with the transitives and intransitives it sometimes causes an approach to the object relation (cf. quedar, fallecer, membrarse, etc.) The verbs cited below are, however, for the most part transitive.

For a discussion of infinitive locutions of the type auer a coraçon de, auer en costumbre de, auer por costumbre de, auer en uso de, escoger por mejor de, etc., see § 27 and § 33.

Meyer-Lübke cites an instance from SMill 105¹ in which he construes the de-infinitive as object of querer, thus showing the invasion of the territory of the pure infinitive object by the prepositional construction: señor, si tu quisieses, yo mucho lo querria, de venir solitario. This instance is, however, only one of a number of such cases that are rather to be taken as the infinitive in apposition with a noun or pronoun (in this case lo), in which group it is by no means rare to find de introducing the infinitive. Querer does, however, take a real de-object in Cron 450b37: quiso por su merced de mostrar esta grand coyta por quien era.

The first citation below brings out more clearly than usual the relative de with infinitive.

aquel anno acabo de cercar toda la uilla Cron 171a41

acordar(se).

This verb, generally reflexive, is also noted with a-, por- and en-infinitives. The Crónica, the only text offering examples, has de most currently.

The construction with pora-infinitive also occurs.

Essos li buscaron de echarlo a mal Duelo 70

çes(s)ar.

The pure infinitive is likewise employed with çes(s)ar, though rarely. Verbs of this sense currently affect de (acabar, dejar, fincar, finar, quedar).

Also: Duelo 140; Mil 867.

cobdiçiar.

The pure infinitive is considerably more frequent than the de-construction with cobdiçiar. The infinitive is also noted with a and por.

cobdiciaua de seer el solo señor de tod ell imperio Cron 81a5
 En Espanna cobdiçio de luego empezar Mil 47

començar.

The pure and a-infinitives are also found with començar. For a discussion of començar with pure infinitive and the possibility of absorption of the preposition a in certain cases, see § 17. This verb, like enpeçar, is conspicuously lacking in the Cid, inceptive action being expressed by conpeçar, pensar, etc. with dependent infinitive. In our other texts començar appears frequently, particularly in the Crónica, where it is found on almost every page. The Crónica greatly prefers a to de with its dependent infinitive, though the de construction occurs about forty times in one hundred pages. Sometimes the two prepositional uses will be noted side by side, a governing the infinitive nearest començar and de the more remote:

començo Mahomet a predigar su secta descubertamentre et de aluorosçar los pueblos contra fe de Cristo Cron 274a5
començoles a dezir et de retraebles vnas cosas Cron 588b40
los començaron a cometer et de los ferir Cron 764b3

The passages are naturally more numerous in which the same preposition occurs with succeeding infinitives:

en comienço de su regnado començara de seer bueno et de darse
a bien, començo luego de darse a mal Cron 304a40
començo de correr et de fazerle mucho mal en la tierra Cron 339b35
començo de labrar la mezquita de Cordoua et de affortalezarla
Cron 344b1
començo de correr et de destroyr toda la tierra et de fazer en ella mucho mal Cron 358a39; also 244b16, 265b29.41, 289b47, 391b8

The second infinitive does not need any preposition at all:

començo de quexarse mucho por ende, et nombrar a si mismo
Cron 341a4
E los del castiello començaron de lidar et ampararse Cron 287b3

In the Alixandre etc., començar de is used especially in short, concise phrases, the connection between començar and the infinitive being close:

començo de çenar	Alix 363	començose de yr	Alix 1045
començo de dezir	Alix 926	començô de fuyr	Alix 1054
començo de feryr	Alix 1045	començô de asomar	Alix 1287
començo de dezir	Alix 1190	començô de plañer	Alix 1757
començo de clamar	Alix 1358	començô de pujar	SOría 40

Other examples of començar with de-infinitive will be found in Cron 10b33, 12b39, 13a31.51, 13b24, 27b12, 192b47, 165a8, 231a34, 233a26, 265b3, 270b29, 285b2.8.31, 288a33, 289b14, 290b27, 291a32, 291b41, 304a42, 304b38, 306b9.42, 309b24, 315b49, 322b31, 323b6, 324b32, 327a2, 328a48, 335b5, 340b32, 341a4, 341b36, 349a31, 359a47, 360b44, 391b42, 397b24, etc.

Examples of cometer with infinitive are noted in the Crónica only. The a-infinitive is used in Cron 72a2: muy grand miedo deuie auer de cometer a passar la.

- ni salie ninguno a ellos a cometer de ferir Cron 75b5
- cometiol de lidiar Cron 81a11
- por que . . . non se atrouiesse a cometer de fazer otro ta fecho Cron 86a45
- como quisiesse cometer de yr Cron 687a31
- cometieron de combatir la çipdad et lidiarla muy de rrezio Cron 704b43
- non osauan cometer de se meter a tan grant peligro Cron 738a33
- . . . fuesen cometer de pasar por do estauan siete Cron 751b39

conpeçar (com-).

With the exception of two instances in the Alixandre, the Cid is the only text offering examples of conpeçar with the de-infinitive. The a-infinitive is also noted with conpeçar. This verb is evidently a fusion of començar and enpeçar,¹ infrequent even in this period since only four examples are at hand outside of the Cid. The pure infinitive is not found with conpeçar at all.

- conpeçó de espolonar Cid 705
- compeçaron de llorar Cid 856
- conpeçós de alegrar Cid 1083
- conpeçó de guerrear Cid 1090
- compeçós de pagar Cid 1201
- conpeço de beuer Alix 2578
- conpeço de clamar Alix 2184
- conpeçó de fablar Cid 1114, 1456, 3306

¹ Cid I, § 161, [2 and Cid II, compeçar.

contender.

Por- and en-infinitives are also found with contender.

... siempre contiene de valer a cuitados,
Gobernar los mezquinos, revocar los errados,
Por tierras e por mares fer miraclos granados Mil 623

cuydar.

The regular infinitive construction of cuydar is without preposition. The use of de does not perceptibly change the sense of the locution. With en, the meaning becomes rather to think about, to consider: estauan cuydando en escoger rey entressi, Cron 230a30.

mas yo non lo afirmo, que cuyo de mentir Alix 2271

cumplir.

The de-infinitive is more often used as subject with impersonal cumplir.

algunas cosas que a ellos non cumplian de leuarlas Cron 637a22 dar.

The more frequent prepositional construction of dar is discussed under dar a, § 44. De occurs in very few instances, and these of slightly doubtful infinitive function. The two locutions noted with de in our texts are dar de comer and dar de uestir, both from the Crónica. The fact that a appears also with comer and uestir in approximately the same sense, though the function of the preposition is so different, indicates that the infinitive is to be taken as verb rather than as noun (dauan a comer et a uestir, Cron 642a40), since a regularly introduces a verbal infinitive expressing goal or purpose. A very similar situation is seen in auer and ser taking de and a with infinitive: ouola a sacar, SDom 416; ouo de fablar, Alix 363; era a mouer, SDom 692, etc. That beber may be used as a noun (here without preposition) is indicated by: Diol beber tan amargo, Loor 73.

The infinitive with dexar may be pure or have a, de, or por with it. The pure and the prepositional constructions are quite distinct in meaning, since without preposition dexar belongs to the fazer group, the causative verbs (in one case the pure infinitive has the usual prepositional sense: por que veyen los vnos a los otros caher, por eso non dexauan su camino tener, Alix 1091). With the prepositional infinitive (a, de and por), dexar has the idea of ceasing, etc. The difference in the resultant locution, whether de or a is used, is negligible, though the functions of the prepositions remain distinct. De as usual has the relative value so often seen with other verbs, since if it were the de of separation, hence privative, a could not be used in an equivalent locution. The a may well have its regular place signification. Both these senses have been also noted for the verbs of beginning, and fit just as well for the verbs of ceasing. Dexar de only occurs in our poetry four times, dexar a not at all. In the Crónica, the prepositional constructions are quite frequent at the end of chapters in some such formula as agora dexa ell estoria de contar della, e torna a dezir de cuemo . . . Cron 44a21.

This verb appears also with pure and en-infinitives.

- non dubda de fallir Alix 55
- pero dubdaua Etor de bien se demeter Alix 627
- estos diablos non dubdan de morir Alix 2165
- Dubdó Valeriano de levarlo consigo SLaur 89

Also: Cron 40b41, 67b33, 67b40, 189a32, 402b37.

enpe(s)çar [em-].

Like the other verbs of the group meaning to begin (començar, conpeçar), enpeçar shows an unsettled condition in the use of prepositions with the infinitive. Conpeçar is the only verb of this type favoring the de-infinitive, començar, and more especially enpeçar, preferably taking a. The pure infinitive occurs with començar and enpeçar, but not with conpeçar. With neither of these verbs does it at all rival the prepositional constructions, however.

- enpesço de baldir menazas Alix 761
- el buen enperador enpeço de fablar Alix 1819
- enpeço de dezir vierbo de amistad Alix 2186

ensayar.

The examples with de come from the Crónica only. The pure infinitive is also found with ensayar.

- ensayaron de lidiar otra uez con los romanos Cron 225a7
- ensayaron de leuantarse Cron 228a24
- ensayaron de lidiar contra Vualia Cron 233b24

The por-infinitive is likewise noted with escoger.

fallecer.

In sense, this intransitive verb may be classed with dexar, finar, fincar, quedar, and cesar, all taking de-infinitive. Of these fallecer and finar are the least in evidence in these texts.

membrarse (men-).

Membrarse and olvidarse are excellent examples of verbs taking the relative de-infinitive. This is the only infinitive construction noted with membrarse.

se non membro ... de nonbrarle en aquella postura Cron 515a21
 ... que se membrassen ... de ayudar a los menores Cron 662b33

mere(s)cer.

The pure infinitive is much more frequent than the de-infinitive with merescer. The a-infinitive is also found. The confused subject in the first example below is to be remarked.

merecist de yazer el dios Anubis contigo Cron 113a23
 merescio de ser llamado don Alfonso el Casto Cron 347a44
 merescie bien de ser emperador Cron 348b52

olvidarse.

No other infinitive use occurs for this verb. Both membrarse and olvidarse are very rare in our texts.

vengo a uos por vna cosa que se oluido de uos dezir Cron 732b23

pensar (-ss-).

Pensar occurs several times with pure infinitive, once each with a and por, but is regular with de. Diez¹ considers pensar de as the paraphrase of an adverbial idea developed similarly to acabar de. Its meaning, however, is by no means clear in all cases. Menéndez Pidal gives the following comparative equivalents for Old Spanish. Usually pensar de has the inceptive sense of disponerse a, but it may depart from this enough to be equivalent to ocuparse en. Occasionally it appears doubtful if any sense at all is left in the locution, as in the case of piénssanse de armar, Cid 1135, where Menéndez

Pidal thinks it may mean either se aperciben a armarse, or simply se arman. The customary recurrence of pensar de, among other set phrases in the Cid, certainly tends to detract from the inherent strength of the locution, but cannot hide its acquired inceptive force. At least a vividness is felt in its use which is foreign to the simple verb. Menéndez Pidal also assigns to his group of verbs giving a perifrasis inútil, besides pensar de, querer, fazer, mandar and ir, in large part doubtless because of their frequency of use. For a careful and thorough study of penser de in Old French, Luker's dissertation¹ will be found of value, as it is on the omission of penser that he bases the so-called historical infinitive in Old French. The frequency of pensar de evidently did not induce a similar construction in Old Spanish, however, probably because of the greater resistance of Spanish in general to the operation of syncope and allied principles. The independent infinitive is in fact extremely rare in any use (see § 22). But the locution pensar de is as common itself as could be desired. It is to be noted that there are far more numerous examples in the Cid than in any other text. It is also especially common in Old French in the epic type of poetry. In the Alixandre it occurs only about one-half the number of times it does in the Cid, though the Alixandre is nearly three times as long. Nor, on the other hand, is pensar de by any means as frequent in the Crónica as in the Cid, from which also it might be inferred that it was considered more fitting to the epic than to any other literary type, prose included. Abundant examples of the locution are cited below, more because of any interest in them reflected from Old French studies than because of their own inherent value. The most current pensar de locutions are: pensar de adobar, pensar de andar, pensar de cavalgar, pensar de yr.

This interesting verb appears three times in the poetry and commonly in the Crónica with the de-infinitive. It has approximately the sense of resolver, decretar. It is found not infrequently joined with such phrases as en su coraçon and en su voluntad. The infinitive with en is also noted, but with a literal sense, in both verb and preposition: Ponian toda femencia en fer a Dios serviço, Soria 13.

- en vno lo han puesto de vencer o moryr Alix 904

Similarity in sense and syntax is noted between punnar and trabaiarse with infinitive. The prepositions de and en are used with both. The Crónica is the only one of our texts yielding examples of either verb with infinitive, though in this they are comparatively abundant. With punnar and trabaiarse we have two very good examples of the relative de-infinitive (relative to, in the matter of, etc.).

With de-infinitive quedar forms one of the regular constructions of the Crónica, but elsewhere is not noted. Fincar de has much the same sense, but is not so frequent. It is interesting that the negative appears in nearly all passages having the quedar locution. No other infinitive constructions with quedar are at hand.

- non quedaua de guisarse para lidiar Cron 19b49
- numqua quedaron de guerrear Cron 44b5
- numqua quedaua de los matar e de los destroyr Cron 49b27
- non quedauan de destroyr la cibdat Cron 50a55

temer.

The pure infinitive is also found with temer. For similar sense and treatment, compare dubdar. The ethical dative reflexive is noted with temer more often than not: temiosse de affrontarse con el, Cron 665a48. The Alixandre and San Millan each offer one instance of temer. The rest are limited to the Crónica, a situation representative of many verbs taking the de-infinitive.

- temien de caualgar Alix 1311
- temie de peccar SMill 76
- non uos temades de perder el seruicio Cron 394a24
- ca de alcançarlos ninguno, non se temien Cron 411a15
- ca se temie de perder el regno por y Cron 422a36

- temiendose de matarse uno a otro Cron 466a15
 se temien de perder toda la tierra Cron 557a15
 temiendose de yr en perdicion Cron 749a37

The reflexives in most of the citations above seem to go with temer, not merely because of their position, but also because, when the infinitive takes a reflexive, the author does not object to two reflexive pronouns in close proximity to each other, as in temiendose de matarse. Theoretically, however, in some passages the reflexive pronoun may be considered as belonging to either temer or the infinitive, irrespective of its position.

For similarity of sense and syntax in punnar and trabaiarse with infinitive, see punnar above. The pure infinitive, and those with en and por, are noted with trabaiarse, though the de-construction is considerably the most frequent. The Crónica is again the only text yielding examples.

- trabaiosse de ganar lo al Cron 16b27

usar.

This verb, with infinitive, is employed as an emphatic substitute for the imperfect indicative, though by no means currently. The very common English equivalent is to be remarked: a aquella eglesia misma usaua el rey . . . de yr a maytines, Cron 490a22 (to that very church the king used . . . to go to matins). The de-infinitive is the regular construction with usar, though those with a and without preposition occur. Again the Crónica is unique in offering examples.

- uso de fazer aquestas cosas Cron 123a29
- usaua mucho de tirar de ballesta Cron 140a10
- non usaua de ser a judgar nin dar juyzios Cron 387b21
- . . . que usasse y de fazer ell officio Cron 544b21
- usauan de uenir guerrear a Toledo Cron 707a19

THE DE-INFINITIVE AS OBJECT OF VERB LOCUTIONS

33. There is little difference in the function of the infinitive in this section and in the last, i.e. the infinitive is a de-object in both cases. There is, however, the essential difference that in the citations of this section the infinitive cannot be construed with any single verb. The infinitive must be considered as the object of the whole verb locution, as otherwise violence would be done to the evident sense of the passages. A good illustration is at hand in auer en voluntad de, where the en voluntad makes all the difference between the necessity or possibility commonly associated with auer de, and the will clearly present in auer en voluntad de. Another type in this group is illustrated by touo por mejor de morir que non fazer ninguna destas cosas, Cron 38a13, where the sense is to consider . . . as . . .. Of this type may be mentioned escoger por mejor, fallar por bien, judgar por guisado, tener guisado, tener por mal, tener por mejor, etc. In such instances as non lo tengo por seso averes tan granados, meterlo a aventura, Alix 908, meterlo is in apposition with the lo preceding. If this lo were omitted, meterlo would be the object of tengo por seso.

Various paraphrases of simple verb senses are likewise noted in this group, e.g. auer en uso for usar, auer en costumbre and auer por costumbre for ser acostumbrado, etc. On the whole, the locutions of this section serve a considerable range of thought, and, because of their ease of adaptation to individual needs, they assist the language toward a greatly increased flexibility of expression. It is a conspicuous fact that the prose Crónica is the only one of these early texts yielding examples of their use with de-infinitive.

This is the most frequent locution of its class. Coraçon is also associated with tener, leuar and meter; see below. The lo of todos lo auien a coraçon de se matar, Cron 288a13, being the object of auien, the infinitive is again in apposition with the object: see paragraph above.

. . . que yo auia tan a coraçon de guardar Cron 39b54

auer por costumbre.

This locution closely resembles auer en costumbre. The same thought is expressed in por esto auie costumbrado de traer . . . los cabellos de tras a la fruente, Cron 92b51, where the auie costumbrado does not represent an ordinary pluperfect sense.

More frequent is tener (por) guisado below.

leuar en coraçón.

Other useful coraçon locutions include auer a coraçón, tener en coraçón and meter en coraçón, all with de-infinitive.

Tener is more generally utilized in locutions of this group than any other single verb, auer included, though the latter is quite frequent. Tener has the sense of to consider, to take for, in tener por bien, tener por dura cosa, tener (por) guisado, tener por mal and tener por mejor, while in the following locutions tener is employed literally: tener a voluntad, tener en voluntad and tener en coraçon.

Also: Cron 541b12, 557b22.

tener por bien.

Next to auer a coraçon this is the most frequent locution of this section. The use of bien, mal and mejor is notable with such verbs as tener, escoger, fallar and judgar: touo por mejor de tener por dura cosa, etc.

Also: Cron 36a37, 342b2, 349a4, 447a24, 447a26, 447a4.

Cosa is extremely rare in these phrases, because the adjective, or adverb alone, suffices for the expression of the thought involved, and is less clumsy.

- tenie por dura cosa . . . de lidiar con sus vezinos Cron 223a40
 tenie por cosa desaguisada de dexar le assi la tierra Cron 223a42

tener (por) guisado.

Por is here expressed or omitted at will. Guisado is also noted in judgar por guisado and tener por cosa desaguisada with de-infinitive object.

- no touiera guisado de lo seer en ninguno logar Cron 79b40

THE DE-INFINITIVE WITH LEXAR, PROMETER, ETC.

34. Concerning the de-infinitive as accusative of thing with verbs taking a dative of person and an accusative of thing, Diez¹ says: "L'application de la préposition n'est rigoureusement observée qu'en français; l'italien n'y renonce pas volontiers, mais l'espagnol peut s'en passer avec la plupart des verbes." He then gives seven examples, of which only one contains de, and in one of which de is optional.

A conclusive criticism cannot be made of Diez's statement at this time, inasmuch as his work is not confined to any one epoch. Yet he would seem to put too much emphasis on the pure infinitive with these verbs, at least in so far as concerns the limited period herein studied. The preposition de is decidedly regular for such constructions in these texts. In fact, the verbs classed under this section take the pure infinitive very rarely, although otorgouos lo yo, Alix 1590, illustrates the type with ordinary objects. It is interesting, however, to note that por and pora with infinitive are found replacing the more clearly objective de-infinitive: see iurar, ordenar, and prometer below.

It will be seen that the class is not large in any case, and might well be included in § 32, dealing with the de-infinitive object without special regard to the indirect personal object, because this does not in any way change the function of the infinitive. This classification is followed for convenience of reference to Otto's work for the Portuguese and to numerous grammars in which such verbs form a distinct group. In general they are verbs of ordering, promising, permitting.

This verb is an excellent illustration of the group, two of the three citations below having the personal object present. Consentir is also used with the pure and en-infinitives.

nim consentiesse a ellos de morar en la tierra Cron 250a43

non quiso el consentir de seerlo Cron 284a5

les non querie el consentir de fazer las trauessuras Cron 465a41

iurar (y-, j-).

In only one instance is yurar(se) noted with personal object: yuraron se de no seruille, Cron 129a49. With weakened purpose present, but attaining approximately the same objective result, this verb may be used with por-infinitive: anbos son sobre ti por matarte jurados, Alix 1669.

- Pusieron e iuraron de dar todas sazones,
 A Sant Millan cada casa de dar tres pipiones SMill 461
yuraron de fazer quant aquellos mandassen Cron 46b49
aunque juraria de esto non falsar SDom 427
juraron de vengarse todos Alix 2535
yuraron se de no seruille Cron 129a49
yurara de seer le leal a ell et a la tierra Cron 292b46
yuremos sobrella de la aguardar Cron 414b23

lexar (see lexar, § 20).

This verb occurs once with the pure infinitive, and once with de.

- de beuir con varones mi ley non me lexar* Alix 1863

ordenar.

This verb, though comparatively rare with infinitive, and in the two cases below not having an indirect object of person present, is a verb quite naturally falling in this class. Por- and pora-infinitives also occur with ordenar: ordeno su fecho para salir, Cron 604a38.

- estos que ellos ordenauan de poner* Cron 87a47
ordeno de fazer . . . sus cortes Cron 540a15

otorgar.

No other infinitive use is noted with otorgar.

- le otorgaua de ge le dar* Cron 371a47
otorgaron de lo fazer assy Cron 610b9
Dios me a otorgado de vencer esta fazienda Cron 635b23
tengolas todas por muy buenas, et otorgo de seer en ellas Cron 666a29

prometer.

This is the most representative verb of the group; nearly all the citations below illustrate the use of the indirect object of person and direct object of thing (here replaced by the infinitive). Por-infinitive is noted with prometer voto in Por partirmel del mundo voto e prometido, SMill 16.

- . . . quel prometiera de fazer grandes onras Cron 39a50
 me prometio de fer enperador Alix 1141

THE de-INFINITIVE INDICATING CAUSE

35. Diez states that the infinitive may replace a noun in those locutions of verb and noun in which the relation of means, cause, separation or aversion is expressed by the preposition de. The truth of this statement can be tested in the constructions cited below, where the substitution of a noun for the infinitive can usually be made with no violence to the sense. The distinction between the de expressing cause and means, and the relative de becomes extremely slight at times: desesperauan ya de poder escapar a uida, Cron 75a14; se gozaua siempre de matar omnes, Cron 220b48. None of the locutions listed below (nor those cited under the de of means, § 37) occur very frequently in the early language, yet cause and means are basic senses of this preposition.

daqui adelante de guardar fe non me puedo alabar Cron 541b21 auer verguença.

si as uerguença de seer yo tu mugier tan linda Cron 43a39
 deuias aver verguença de comigo te tomar Alix 2188

No preposition is used specifically with the infinitive in:

Io verguenza avria al mi fijo rogar Mil 780
deurie auer verguença ante otros fablar Alix 1261

cans(s)ar.

This verb is represented only by its past participle.

cansados de matar Cron 136b2
canssados de lidiar Cron 441a10

castigarse.

Indicating purpose, the pora-infinitive is found with castigarse.

los que se castigassen de fazer mal Cron 3b33

desesperar.

This verb might well be classed, perhaps, under the relative de.

desesperauan ya de poder escapar a uida Cron 75a14

dolerse.

The double use of de before subject and infinitive is of particular interest in this instance:

doliendosse de tan nobles mugieres cuemo aquellas de perderse assi Cron 220a20

en(n)oiarse.

se enoiaua de matarlos Cron 227a39

de fablar del buen Sancto no nos ennoiariamos SDom 752

fallarse mal.

de lexar lo a vida temiense mal fallar Alix 1722

perder.

tu non perdrias nada de conmigo venir SOria 158

preciarse.

The en-infinitive also occurs with preciarse.

se preciauan de fazer de coraçon bien Cron 703b35
se preciauan de disputar Cron 191a44

THE DE-INFINITIVE INDICATES SEPARATION

36. The function of the preposition illustrated in this section is one most natural to de. It is not necessary to look for the subtle distinctions found in the relative de, or in the de of cause and means. In determining the members of this group, the simple test of reading the context with de in the sense of from may be applied. Thus the individual verbs vary all the way from partir(se), with which the de of separation is quite literal and objective, to curiar and guardar, where a figurative interpretation may be necessary, although the original concept is clearly present. There is nearly always some sense of motion, objective or subjective, to be felt in these locutions, the best examples of this type of verb being partir(se), desuizarse, leuantarse, rancar, tornar, venir. Less evident, though implied, motion appears in despertar, guardar, tenerse, and escusar. As a class, the verbs of separation are stronger and more frequent than those of cause or means.

Bien te curieste, madre, de non lo façer Loor 20
 dios curie mis amigos de prender tal mandado Alix 221

despertar.

The only instance of despertar with the de of separation employs the infinitive as a noun.

desperfo del dormir Cron 340b49

detardarse.

nos detardan de adobasse essas yentes cristianas Cid 1700

desuiarse.

The identical use of noun and infinitive with the de of separation is to be remarked in this passage:

començo a desuiarse de la paz de los romanos de non la querer tener ni auerla con ellos Cron 234a20 escusar(se).

This verb appears both as transitive and reflexive.

escusolo Parmenio que por bien lo veyen
 de yr a cometer los . . . Alix 898 bien sabian escusarse de ganar enemigos SDom 6 non se pudieron escusar de non fazer lo que el Çid querie Cron 562a26

guardar(se).

In one instance, guardar taking de-infinitive is a transitive, elsewhere reflexive. This verb found a most natural place in the early religious language.

Bien vos a Dios guardada de caer en es lazo Mil 532
 guarda te de peccar SDom 313 en fechos e en dichos se guardan de pecar Alix 2373
 bien vos guardastes de darme hospedado Sig 33
 guardando se . . . de non matar si non quanto menos el podie
Cron 69b28
 . . . que se guardassen . . . de aorar los ydolos Cron 120b51
 guardosse de fazer mal a los cristianos Cron 168a1
 punnaron en guardarse de fazer mal fecho Cron 392b39
 uos guardedes de caer en yerro Cron 419b24

leuantarse.

The pure infinitive and that with a, por and pora are found with leuantarse expressing various degrees of purpose. When yantar appears as the infinitive, as in the first passage below, it may be suspected of having largely a substantival force.

leuantosse el Çid . . . de yantar Cron 613b44
 se auie leuantado de dormir Cron 632a49

partirse.

All the examples of this verb with de-infinitive come from the Crónica. It is rather surprising that there are no illustrations at hand of partir used intransitively with de-infinitive, but actually all are reflexive. Partirse also occurs with pora-infinitive.

non les abondo partir se ellos dell imperio obedecer Cron 168a20
 se partio Muça de fazerle mal Cron 365b22 non se partiendo aun de lidiar et de uuscarse mucho mal unos a otros Cron 367b23

nunqua se partirie de guerrearle et de fazerle quanto mal pudiesse Cron 373b6

. . . que se non partiessen de guerrear al rey Cron 382a28
partieronse de lidiar los unos de los otros Cron 558a23

quitarse.

quitosse . . . de guerrear Cron 325b6

se quitarie el rey . . . de demandarles ninguna cosa Cron 557a13

non se quitarie de fazerle quanto mal pudiesse Cron 568a40

rancar.

De subir en cauallo non lo pudieron rancar Alix 1722

retenerse.

non se retouo de fazer toda nemiga Cron 304b3

tenerse.

se podie el philosopho tener de fablar Cron 146b22

tornar(se).

Two examples of this construction come from the Cid. Menéndez-Pidal considers that the locution tornar de adds practically nothing to the simple verb. It is treated in this section, because it is evident that tornar de may be a verb of separation, even if it has little or none of this sense in certain individual cases. According to Menéndez Pidal,¹ tornan de castigar, Cid 383, is equivalent to castigan, while se sonrrio might well replace tornós de sonrisar, Cid 2889. Such cases would indicate the relative de rather than the de of separation. The construction was so rare in any case that a conclusive argument cannot be based on examples, but it does appear somewhat radical to give tornar de no meaning whatever. If it is perchance true, as Menéndez Pidal states, that querer, fazer, mandar, ir, tornar, pensar and conpeçar became at times so weakened as to mean little or nothing, it would seem to be equivalent to maintaining that early Spanish might well have dispensed with some of its most racy and frequent expressions.

One example of the de of separation with tornar is noted in the Crónica, but here the infinitive is marked as a substantive: se torno a Burgos de su andar, Cron 434a43. Tornar was of course more current with the pure infinitive and that with a, por, pora and para expressing purpose.

venir (u-).

More frequent occurrence than is actually at hand of venir with the de-infinitive of separation is to be expected from its frequency of use in other constructions. The locution did not progress as far in Old Spanish as it did in French, where it came to express an adverbial concept (venir de commonly rendered by to have just).

vinia de leyer Alix 32

quando de correr monte vengo o de caçar Alix 356

Do se vinie el de complir su follia Mil 81

uinie de destroyr los cossarios Cron 61b24 todos los que fallaua que uinien de cenar de sus posadas, firiilos muy mal Cron 123a16

uinie de coger su pan Cron 129b24

THE DE-INFINITIVE INDICATING MEANS

37. For a discussion of the preposition de expressing means and cause, cf. § 35. Certain of the verbs listed below (fartarse, gizar, pagarse) might be classed as well under the relative de or the de of cause; e.g. Nos fartan de catarle, Cid 3495, may be rendered they are never satisfied by means of, or in the matter of, watching him. This group, like that of cause, is quite small, and the individual verbs in it are all rare in this construction.

Comer is the infinitive in each of the two cases of adobar with the de of means. Comer may be largely substantival in force.

el Çid mando adobar de comer Cron 601a11

en adobar de comer . . . Cron 704a40

amenazar.

amenazaron a Maria de la matar Cron 135a53

gozarse.

As a transitive verb, gozar is found once with pure infinitive.

se gozaua siempre de matar omnes Cron 220b48

menazar.

THE DE-INFINITIVE WITH SUBSTANTIVES

38. This group is one of the most important of infinitive constructions. Theoretically it is almost unlimited. Practically there are only the limits of sense and connotation of the individual substantive. Aside from the ordinary attributive use of the de-infinitive with a noun (seso de fablar, Mil 691; escuela de cantar, Mil 354; edad de casar, Cron 654b20; tiempo de casar, Cron 22a34), probably the most frequently utilized type of this construction was the combination of verb and noun in approximately the same sense as a simple verb, and taking the de-infinitive as did also the simple verb. Some examples of this process have been noted above, but they come most appropriately under this section, as evidenced by the fact that the noun element remains constant while the verb and modifiers of the noun vary: e.g. miedo de (with infinitive) in:

- Non aiades nul miedo de caer en porfazo Mil 532
auja muy grant mjedo de seer iusticiado SDom 747 todos auien miedo de seyer mal andantes Alix 2005
por miedo de seer uençudos Cron 98b29
Cogieron muchos miedo de façer tal peccado Mil 410

In these instances it is evident that each citation illustrates a distinct type of the miedo de (with infinitive) construction, three variously modified with auer, and one with coger, as the verb. Likewise, all are variants for the simple verbal concept of fearing, ordinarily expressed by temer or dubdar. Other illustrations of this principle are ouieron acuerdo de fazer un teatro, Cron 27b53, auer acuerdo being a variant for acordar; non aves de salvarte deseo, Mil 190, auer deseo being used for desear; pavor avria de seer engannado, Mil 641, auer pauor like auer miedo replacing temer or dubdar; auer grant cobdiçia de salvar los errados, Duelo 38, auer cobdiçia standing for cobdiçiar. Another field of usefulness of the noun with de-infinitive was in prepositional phrases, where the noun employed necessitated the de-infinitive, if a dependent verb followed: En logar de servirte, SMill 104; En uez de castigar los otros, Cron 111b6; por razon de sacar aun mas auer, Cron 684a33. Frequency of use caused some of these locutions, as opposed to others of less frequent use, to be considered and felt as units (see § 77, composed prepositions).

The noun and dependent infinitive may also express the necessity or futurity noted in the ser locutions with a and de (for which in Latin the gerund or gerundive was employed: Carthago delenda est): es a yr, Alix 656; non son de creyer, Alix 2194; mucho es de temer, Sig 69; and the de-infinitive with nouns in fijas de casar, Cid 2082; varon de alabar et sabio, Cron 718a50; dardos... de alançar, Cron 54a47. The active infinitive is rarer in this construction: non so yo omne de alçarme con tierra, Cron 419a10; uarones de meter espanto, Cron 691a13.

THE de-INFINITIVE WITH ADJECTIVES

39. The genitive of the gerund, as used with adjectives in Latin, was replaced by the infinitive in the Romance Languages: cupidus dominandi; muy cobdicioso de sennorear, Cron 66b25. Diez¹ finds the infinitive with the adjective not non-existent in Latin, but in any case extremely rare. In Old Spanish the relative de (in the matter of, etc.) is regularly employed to introduce the infinitive dependent on an adjective: acuciosos de uenir, Cron 49a44; buena es de catar, Sac 190. In instances where the Romance infinitive replaces the ablative of the supine in Latin (mirabile dictu, facilis cognitu), the action is merely named without definite indication of active or passive sense: ligera de fazer, Cron 420b11; dulces de veyer, Alix 1616; duro de traer, Cron 129b1. If it is desired to define the action as passive, the auxiliary with the past participle is used: merezientes erades de seer enforcados, SMill 276; mereçiente era de seer fostigado, Mil 359. The de-infinitive depending on an adjective may of course on occasion have a subject or an object: Yo non seria digna de veer tan grant gloria, SOria 35; duechas de comer los cuerpos muertos, Cron 209b28; ligera de mantenerla . . . un prinçep, Cron 692a27. The simple verb finds another circumlocution in the combination of estar or ser and adjective with de-infinitive: e.g. estar cobdiçioso being a variant for auer cobdiçia and cobdiçiar with de-infinitive. A number of past participles are included with the adjectives below, when it is evident that their adjectival force is proportionate to their verbal force: numqua fuera ninguno atreuudo de las cerrar, Cron 102b28; eran uagarosos e descuydados de fazer ninguna cosa, Cron 49a45; de lidiar comigo tu fuste osado, Alix 1763. The adjective is also found taking the infinitive with por, pora, para and en, the first three prepositions expressing various degrees of the purpose element so easily read into the infinitive relation, while en has a place or manner value (compare English ready to go): prestos somos por complir tu mandado, Alix

(Guisarse is used currently with de-, por-, pora- and para-infinitives. Aguisado has the por-infinitive in nos por defendernos somos mal aguisados, Alix 873):

de vengar nuestra onta era bien aguisado Alix 416

non era aguisado de en fasienda entrar Alix 1279

(It takes also the infinitives with por and pora).

apareiado era de obedescerle et ayudarle Cron 648b8

de fer quanto mandares somos aparejados Alix 754

aspero.

This is an excellent example of the Romance infinitive for the Latin supine. In phrases of this type the action is named without being defined as active or passive. The feeling, however, is often for a passive sense in transitive infinitives.

liuiano de creer el mal Cron 451a3

de comer liuanos Alix 797

maestro.

fue de pintar muy maestro Cron 121b51

malo.

Like bueno, malo is in the aspero group of adjectives. It is not so frequently used with infinitive as might be expected from its sense, the Alixandre being the only text to specially favor it in this construction.

somos gentes ligeras, malas de conquerir Alix 1915

son . . . malos de rreferir Alix 2056

de garesçer muy mala SDom 410

Also: Alix 2347, 2191.

osado.

This is the most frequent adjective, participial or otherwise, taking the de-infinitive construction. The infinitive is even found without preposition, a use particularly rare with adjectives: Nunqua mas fo osado al monge escarnir, Mil 480; Non seria osada la razon empezar, Mil 780; castigat uuestros hijos que non sean osados en sembradas agenas entrar con sus ganados, SDom 469. There is the possibility of the omission of de for metrical reasons in the three instances above, as there was in the case of the preposition a discussed under auer a. It seems that neither of these very common prepositions was indispensable in a verse, if the locution employed was frequent enough to carry the sense with it. Osado was doubtless so familiar that whether de introduced the infinitive or not, the sense was quite clear.

de valerli osadas Mil 438

de fablar antel Rey, ¿ qui uos fizoo osado ? SDom 142

Also: Alix 1168, 2089, 2212; SDom 765.

pensado.

Two instances of this interesting variant of the pensar idea are noted in the Signos.

De catarlo nul omne sol non será pensado Sig 7
 Mas de fablar ninguno solo non sera pensado Sig 17

pesado.

This participle of pesar is noted with de-infinitive in two instances of the aspero type.

Dizen una fazaña pesada de creyer Alix 741 un mal muesso pesado de tragár Duelo 35

poderoso.

The preposition de is omitted in this paraphrase of the poder idea: non fue poderoso el dient enti poner, SDom 769.

sabidor (found also with en-infinitive).

muy sabidor de armas e de caualgar Cron 138a20

sabroso.

Both examples of sabroso have oyr as the infinitive, and are similar to aspero in use.

bel miraglo . . . sabroso de oyr SDom 335
 . . . sabroso de oyr SMill 321

vozero.

This is a good example of the relative de-infinitive with adjectives.

fue vozero de demandar los derechos Cron 157b39

THE INFINITIVE WITH A

The a-infinitive is less varied, and presents less subtlety of sense and function than the de-infinitive. While de in its relative sense lost much of its original force and was extended to numerous verbs not normally taking a relative connection with the dependent infinitive, a preserved and strengthened its original force. It extended its use to a much larger number of verbs than those taking it in the earliest period of Spanish, yet a kept its sense intact. As shown by Meyer-Lübke¹ ad in Latin expressed proximity in space. From this it came with verbs of motion to express direction toward an object. This concept in turn naturally broadened its usefulness to include the goal and even the purpose of an action. And here, indeed, are seen practically all the elements of the a with infinitive in ¹ Gram. III, § 390. See also Hanssen, Gram., pp. 292-297.

Old Spanish, all developing naturally and easily out of the original concept of proximity. With transitive verbs, this idea of proximity generally explains satisfactorily the use of a with verbs normally taking the object infinitive. The presence of de or a is not at all natural to the expression of the object relation between infinitive and finite verb, since in fact the preposition breaks any real objectivity and substitutes for it an essentially distinct relation. Thus comenzar with de- or a-infinitive evidences a different point of view from that to be felt in the same verb with its pure infinitive object: to begin in regard to, in the matter of . . ., or to begin at . . . instead of to begin it. The class of verbs taking the object infinitive and coming to employ a with it, is much smaller than the group taking de. With intransitive verbs of motion a had an unrivalled function in indicating the goal of the motion (andar, yr, caualgar, etc.). These verbs took the pure infinitive in the earliest period of the language, but it was not long before a, which was stronger and more explicit, surpassed the pure infinitive in most of this territory (Issió a recibirlas, Mil 169; mouieron a lidiar, Alix 532; Vayamos posar, Cid 1531, etc.). With reflexive verbs, and transitives having an object present, a also had a normal field of development, so that these classes, as well as the intransitives, are strongly represented in our texts (e.g. darse and tomarse, ayudar and poner, a indicating goal: dieron se a guarir, Alix 734; ayudol . . . a armar, Cron 341a45). A group rich in examples and offering a number of interesting problems to be taken up later is that of auer and ser with the a-infinitive.

An important fact concerning the development of the a-infinitive is that it followed closely the treatment of the pure infinitive in several of its uses. Both took the object-infinitive (if this somewhat inaccurate term can be applied to the a-infinitive with verbs like comenzar), both expressed goal and purpose with intransitives and reflexives. Likewise both were used with auer and ser, though with auer the later limitation of the pure infinitive to expression of futurity and the a-infinitive to that of necessity, make the similarity less apparent. Noting, however, these facts for the pure and a-infinitives, Lachmund divided his treatise on the Infinitiv im Altfranzösischen into two chapters only: I. Reiner Infinitiv (und Infinitiv mit à), and II. Präpositionaler Infinitiv. The pure and the a-infinitives are not the same, and cannot be adequately treated in the same section. Instead of being in harmony with each other in the early period of the language, they were rather inimical to each other. The a-infinitive was striving to win over the territory of its older and more primitive rival, and to a large extent succeeded in so doing, at least in those phases of the pure infinitive varying from goal to purpose. Hence the effort should be made to distinguish clearly between these two categories of infinitives rather than voluntarily to fuse them. And there were several real distinctions between them, of which the most important follow:

1. The infinitive as subject was quite frequent and varied when pure, while with a it was practically non-existent: cuydar non es saber, Alix 1728; les conuinie a dexar de combater se, Cron 71a23.

2. Most of the verbs taking the pure infinitive as object did not admit the a-infinitive, because the pure infinitive was felt to be the real object of the action with no admixture of other senses such as goal and purpose (cf. querer, poder, mandar, fazer, etc.): fizolo quedar, Alix 492; Veol . . . morir, Loor 78; non lo osaua catar, Alix 36.

3. With the intransitives of motion, the reflexives, etc., though the concept of goal was present in the pure infinitive, it was felt to be weak, while with the a-infinitive it was strong and merged more closely into that of purpose: hir los hemos fferir, Cid 1690; vas a resgebir grant gloria, Alix 2494; . . . se ayuntassen adefender la fe, Cron 449a46.

4. With the relative, interrogative, and comparative particles, the pure infinitive had a large field uninvaded by the a-construction: non se sabien que fer, Mil 396; non sauemos do yr, SDom 362.

5. The temporal use of a, coming from its earlier place significance, is unknown to the pure infinitive (see § 2, treating the infinitive as substantive): al tirar de la lança, Cid 3686; Al salir de la missa, Cid 2070.

THE A-INFINITIVE AS SUBJECT

40. Meyer-Lübke¹ lists conuenir as the only verb in Spanish taking the a-infinitive as subject. From the evidence this seems to be true, inasmuch as with conuenir the real subject of the action is made an indirect object in the same manner as with the impersonals discussed under the pure and the de-infinitives (see § 9 and § 28), while the other verbs take the usual personal subject. It is evident that the preposition a was not so well suited to introducing the subject-infinitive as was de, since it could not weaken its sense sufficiently; i.e. it could always be felt as an integral part of the sentence, thus somewhat detracting from the prominence desired for the infinitive. Examples of conuenir with a-infinitive are not rare in the Crónica, but are not noted in any other of these texts.

- . . . quel conuenie a auer priuança Cron 427b18
esto conuino a sser por la muerte de don Aluar Perez Cron 740a7
por fuerça les conuenie a recibir y danno Cron 762b25
uos conuiene desta guisa a uenir con armas Cron 67b6
les conuinie a dexar de combater se Cron 71a23
uos conuiene a fazer uestra uida Cron 77a11
conuiene a saber Cron 482a27, 704a7, 716b4, 665a10

THE A-INFINITIVE AS OBJECT

41. The group of a-infinitives as object of the action includes about fifteen verbs, thus constituting a very much smaller group than the corresponding construction under de. The apparent reason for this is, as suggested above, that the force of a is persistent, while that of de is evanescent in such locutions. Thus, in the object group, with començar, conpeçar,

empeçar and dexar the locative sense of a is predominant (place where), while with alcançar, cobdiçiar, cometer, derrancar and esforçar there is implied or expressed motion toward something (for examples, see individual verbs below).

Some verbs were strongly influenced to take the a-infinitive by the subtle, and usually indefinable, forces of analogy with other verbs to which the a-sense was entirely congruous. For instance, deuer is found with the a-infinitive, yet it would seem that this verb was so prevailingly pure in its infinitive relations, that even the occasional use of the a-infinitive would have been thought undesirable. The sense and frequency of the verb itself would appear to exact an infinitive-object with no limitations rather than the same object limited by a preposition expressing direction, goal, or place where. It is of interest, however, to note these prepositional influences working one against the other for supremacy within a given field of expression, and the gradual success of one or another of them to the partial or complete suppression of the rest. Outside the object group with a, it will be seen that, along with a certain tendency to develop the goal element of a into that purpose, there is almost perfect harmony between verb and preposition (in the groups of intransitive verbs of motion, transitives, reflexives, auer and the like): anda a furtar, Alix 766; se ayuntaron . . . a fazerle grandes cortes, Cron 644a7; esforçosse a fazelles quanto mal pudo, Cron 30a37; . . . quel ayudarie a auer Denia, Cron 548a24; ouola a sacar, SDom 416.

començar.

The pure and de-infinitives were also used with començar. In the period of our texts the struggle between de and a for use in this locution was at its height. In the Cid there is no evidence of de with the infinitive depending on començar, but in the Santo Domingo and the Alixandre, de does appear not infrequently. In the Crónica, de is common, though it never occurs as often as a. In fact, in the same sentences the two appear side by side in the Crónica (see § 32, començar). This indicates that it was not a matter of very great moment to the writer whether de or a was used with començar, and that to him there was nothing incongruous even in using both of them together. Probably the ever-increasing popularity of the de-infinitive in its many uses accounts in part for its sharing in the començar construction with a. It will be remembered that the same rivalry existed between de and à with comencier in the Old French of the period:

- començo alabrar por dexar el pedir SDom 107

The de-infinitive is also used with cometer.

- muy grand miedo deuie auer de cometer a passar la Cron 72a2 conpeçar.

Three out of the four cases of conpeçar with a-infinitive come from the Cid. This verb is a compound of the two other verbs meaning to begin, començar and enpeçar, as discussed by Menéndez Pidal.¹ The preposition de is also noted with conpeçar, occurring eight times as compared with the four of a. This is contrary to the habits of other verbs of beginning, which affect the locative a more often than the relative de.

conpeço a dezir mucho villano prouerbio Alix 1347

conpeçó mio Çid a dar a quien quiere prender so don Cid 2115

deuer.

The pure infinitive is exceptionally regular with deuer in these texts. It was remarked as a conspicuous fact under deuer with pure infinitive (see § 14), that deuer with de-infinitive does not occur in the Cid, Berceo's poems, or in the Crónica. The a-infinitive, however, is found with deuer in three instances from the Crónica (twice having saber as the dependent infinitive).

deuedes a saber que . . . Cron 453b17

Et uos deuedes a saber que . . . Cron 733a25

non es cosa que deua omne a creer Cron 739a27

dexar.

This verb occurs most often in Old Spanish with pure infinitive in the factitive sense already described in the fazer group (to leave, to let). With the prepositions a, de and por, quite a variation in sense is found in dexar and infinitive (to cease, to leave off). It was probably not the de of separation that was associated with dexar, but rather that same dim relative de so easy to utilize in numerous ways (to leave off in regard to . . .), since it was the relative de that permitted a frequently to be used in its place, while the de of separation or the de of means and cause stood for senses that a could not participate in.

Thus a is found with dexar and infinitive in six instances from the Crónica, the combination having the same sense as the de-locution. The a had apparently a place where relation at first, as it did with començar, etc. In one instance the pure infinitive is equivalent to the prepositional use: por que veyen los vnos a los otros caher por eso non dexauan su camino tener, Alix 1091.

enpeçar (em-).

The pure and de-infinitives also occur with enpeçar, though the construction with a is by far the most frequent. No instance of enpeçar with infinitive is noted in the Cid, but other texts offer it regularly. In the Cid, conpeçar and començar are used in its stead.

THE A-INFINITIVE INDICATES GOAL WITH INTRANSITIVE VERBS OF MOTION

42. No violence is done to the natural function of the preposition with these verbs (place where, to which, etc.), nor is it necessary to read below the surface to understand its sense. That the a-construction ran parallel with the pure infinitive in this particular group, and that it gradually superseded the latter, except with a small number of verbs that still maintained the older custom of taking the infinitive pure, has already been shown in § 21. The preposition is, however, much more flexible than might be supposed, since there are perceptible several different degrees of the concept called goal by the grammarians merging from time to time into that of purpose. It is weaker than the purpose expressed by por, pora, and para, yet it is undoubtedly a real and natural outgrowth of the original goal sense of a. There was sufficient virility in a to enable it on occasion to govern its infinitive with little or no dependence on an individual verb (i.e. in clausal dependence): iban a la iglesia a la missa oir, Sac 285; Fue a Sancto Domingo amerced li clamar, SDom 607; passo allent la sierra a agosto coger, SDom 421; for instances pure, with por, pora and para, see pp. 75, 209, 233, 235. For such cases it was customary to allow por, pora or para to take the infinitive because these at all times expressed purpose, whether depending on a single verb or a clause. This delicate fusion of goal and purpose in the a-infinitive with the verbs of motion listed below is to be felt rather than proved for individual instances.

As in other constructions where the pure and a-infinitives ran more or less parallel, the a appears in a proportionately greater number of cases with verbs of motion in the Crónica than in the poetry of the period, both because of the tendency of poetry to cling to traditional constructions and because of the lateness of the Crónica in the period concerned. For further discussion of the a-infinitive, see yr below.

adelinan a posar Cid 2857

andar.

In Old Spanish andar was very rare with infinitive, with or without preposition. The function of yr was very close to that of andar, and yr was the most frequent of all the verbs of motion. Later, the less general andar came more and more into popular favor. It is notable that the two cases cited below have furtar as the infinitive, thus indicating not a general application of andar, but a specific locution. Por and en are also found with the infinitive in andar locutions.

No other infinitive construction is noted with auenir. The simple verbs venir, llegar, etc. served ordinarily for such cases as this, but with reflexive form pora-infinitive is found.

entrar.

The pure and a-infinitives are noted with entrar. Purpose is to be felt in several of the passages cited herewith.

This is the most generally utilized verb of motion in Old Spanish. Meyer-Lübke¹ tells us that with venir and ir started the general use of the pure infinitive with verbs of motion. Such a construction of the infinitive existed in Latin with ire and venire, and gradually supplanted the supine so used (e.g. ad Caesarem gratulatum convenerunt). The appearance of the preposition is of course considerably later than the pure infinitive, but having once started, it was not slow to usurp a major portion of the field with this class of verbs. At the period of the texts studied here, the territory was by no means largely occupied by either construction, but both were employed commonly, the pure infinitive losing, and the a-infinitive gaining, but both strong. Eleven intransitive verbs of motion appear with pure infinitive, eighteen with a-infinitive, and in general those taking the pure construction likewise take the a-form. So it is not hard to see the comparative favor in which the two constructions were held. It was inevitable that the a-infinitive should gain in ordinary use with verbs of motion, since motion was so intrinsic a part of the a function. No verb taking the infinitive illustrates so well as yr the various shades of goal and purpose that may be merged in the infinitive relation to the finite verb, as yr was used currently with the pure infinitive and with all the prepositions expressing purpose (a, por, pora, para): la manol ban besar, Cid 298; donde iria a posar, SOria 40; Iuan los mandaderos por la paz asentar, Alix 1079; yuan ellos para fablar con ell, Cron 463a38; el fuese . . . para meter rrecua a la frontera, Cron 737b43.

A very interesting group of forms are those coming from the verb ser, found in Old Spanish in place of the etymologically correct forms from the perfect and allied tenses of ire. The same interchange of verbs meaning to be and to go is found in other languages, especially in the more popular strata of language (cf. the English vulgarism I was to New York last week). Unlike English, Spanish had the preposition a to express either place where or to which (English at and to), thus facilitating the confusion of the two constructions. The etymological forms from ire, especially in the singular, were phonologically weaker than those of ser, and this hastened the adoption of the ser forms. The intransitive sense of yr is maintained even when a reflexive pronoun is used to mark the spontaneity of an action:¹ fuese . . . a acorrerlos, Cron 341b1.

Only the Crónica offers examples of llegar with a-infinitive. A figurative sense such as is found in the French arriver à with infinitive is noted in the passages below. Other infinitive constructions of llegar have por, pora or no preposition, with or without clausal dependence.

This is one of the more current verbs of motion, taking the pure infinitive as well as that with a, por and pora. It occurs most commonly in the locution salir a receber, of which about thirty cases are found in these few texts. Without reçebir, salir is also noted not infrequently, but unquestionably this is its most favored locution. It may or may not take the preposition a with reçebir. The majority of the instances with a come from the Crónica.

This verb offers as great a variety of infinitive construction as any other verb of motion, being employed with a, de, en, por, para, pora, and without preposition. Menéndez Pidal states¹ that tornar in the Cid does not have the iterative sense which is frequent in the derivatives of volvere and tornare as cited by Diez.² Menéndez Pidal further considers that tornar might almost as well be omitted in so far as it affects the meaning of the verb used with it as infinitive. This would seem to me too hazardous a statement to make so definitely. That tornar a with infinitive departed from its strictly literal meaning, and that it became more or less of a formula with the author of the Cid cannot be denied. That it does not in the Cid have the iterative sense found in the same construction in various other authors need not be questioned either. But this hardly proves that nothing is added to the sense of the infinitive. It may well have been felt to intensify the sense of the infinitive and give a force to its action that could not have been gained by merely using the infinitive in a finite form. For instance, in the Cid 298, there seems to be present an inceptive force unobtainable by the substitution of se sonrió for tornó a sonrisar. However it may be in the Cid, where there is evident a greater weakening of sense than in the same locution used in other texts, in the Crónica and elsewhere can be noted two distinct senses, both to be expected from the original meaning of the verb tornar: to turn to the doing, and to do again (i.e. to return to the doing). It is the first of these two senses that allows itself to become weakened until Menéndez Pidal doubts its very existence. In the Crónica are found several clear cases of the iterative sense of tornar a with infinitive:

² Gram. III, p. 219, 6.

torno el pueblo a yudgarse por consules assi cuemo de primero
Cron 7a41

Here the deciding phrase is assi cuemo de primero, indicating a return to a former condition. Other citations of the same nature are:

tornaremos a fablar de Hercules Cron 7a13 (Hercules has been mentioned a few lines before)

ouo quatrocientos e quaraenta e tres annos, fasta que torno a auer emperadores en Roma Cron 7a44

One interesting case of tornar a occurs in the Crónica 578b28, where a seems to express a purpose element closely bordering on the iterative sense illustrated above, yet being subtly distinct (to return to take it): Capitulo de como los moros de Valencia se arrepintieron porque dexaran a Abenjaf su cabdiello, yl querien tornar a tomar. There is clear purpose in Cron 342a39, due to dependence of the infinitive on the clause instead of on tornar itself: se querie tornar para su tierra a recibir el regno.

In the citations following, there is no apparent iteration of sense. The tornar a has its primitive concept of to turn to the doing:

agora dexa ell estoria de fablar desto, e torna a contar de cuemo el poder de los Romanos entro en Espanna. This is followed by the chapter heading: Aqui se comienza la estoria del sennorio que los Romanos ouieron en Espanna, Cron 18b1, where the important word is comienza, indicating the broaching of a new subject. The same condition is found in Cron 20a35, where the actual description of the event follows the announcement of the subject: torno a contar de cuemo los romanos enuiaron a Cipion el mancebo a Espanna; Cron 665b46 is another good illustration of this principle: ell rey don Sancho torno a preguntar al rey don Fernando . . . la razon de su uenida et a affincarle por cuio consejo uiniera assi. See also Cron 179a47, 180a50.

In the Cid, tornar occurs with a-infinitive as follows:

- tornós a sonrisar Cid 298
- él a las niñas tornólas a catar Cid 371
- mio Çid con los sos tornós a acordar Cid 666
- tornáronse a armar Cid 695

- alégrasle el coraçón e tornós a sonrristar Cid 1266
- tornós a alegrar Cid 1455

(h)uuiar.

The more frequent construction has the pure infinitive with (h)uuiar (see § 21).

- antes que a la flota se uuiassen a coier Cron 21b5
- nos uuiaran a guisar de caualleros Cron 29b5
- ante que se huuiasen a coier Cron 753b27

venir (u-).

Next to yr, venir was the most influential verb of motion in early Romance.¹ What applies to the syntax of yr in general applies to that of venir, since they were of the same historical dignity, and represented converse views of the same action. Of the two yr was the more frequently used, and was found available for a variety of locutions that could not utilize venir.

Yet venir itself is currently met in all the texts of early Spanish, both with pure infinitive and with the various prepositions that regularly went with verbs of motion: a, de, por and pora. It is normal in its function of goal with the preposition a, though here, as in the case of yr, there is often some intermixture of the element of purpose. Most of the citations with a below are taken from the Crónica, but nearly all texts except the Cid are represented. This text by preference employs the pure infinitive. In the Crónica the locution most affected is venir a acorrer as in el rey vernie a acorrerle, Cron 584a22 (other examples in Cron 383b22, 400a36, 439b22, 472a22, 500a1).

THE A-INFINITIVE INDICATES GOAL WITH REFLEXIVE VERBS

43. The class of reflexives taking the a-infinitive is even larger than the last class discussed, that of the intransitive verbs. That this is true does not cause surprise when it is remembered that the group is composed of members of other groups not fundamentally reflexives, such as the transitive and intransitive verbs used for convenience with the reflexive pronouns (acordarse, tornarse, mouerse, etc.). This is particularly true of the transitives, since any transitive can take a reflexive pronoun, subject only to the limitations of its sense.

Notable among transitive verbs that have a well recognized standing as reflexives are dar, echar, meter, tomar, etc. A verb may appear in all three classes with the preposition a (e.g. mouer and tornar), viz., as a transitive, intransitive, and reflexive.

The normal function of a is evidently to indicate the goal of the action: acogense a andar, Cid 2690; dar se ya a morir, Cron 91b34; echos a dormir, Cron 38b11; Mouieronse a andar, Alix 1712. Yet the connection between the verb and the preposition may be less close than in the above cases and may indicate a considerable degree of purpose, as was pointed out for several verbs of the last group (a penas se pudieron leuantar a recibirlle, Cron 665b24). In others, the relation approaches that of verb object (non se atrevie a yr, Cron 20b43; se acordarian a darle la uilla, Cron 749a18).

The verbs most typical of this group (i.e. those not taking any other than this a-infinitive of goal) are: acogerse, apresurarse, cogerse, darse, echarse, meterse (for examples see the individual verbs below).

acójense a andar Cid 2690

acordarse.

The infinitive also has de, por and en with acordarse.

se acordarian a darle la uilla Cron 749a18

apartarse.

Para-infinitive is likewise noted with apartarse.

se aparto yent a llamar un Dios et a circumcidar se Cron 109a22

yo non me aparto con mugeres nin a cantar nin a beuer Cron 589a22

apresurarse.

. . . que se apresurasse a uenir Cron 566a7

apresurosse a uenir Cron 566a11

assentarse.

Yantar may have substantival force in the examples below (cf. English sit down to dinner and sit down to dine, yantar representing both dinner and dine; a indicates goal most clearly with the substantival yantar).

assentando se los omnes a yantar Cron 55a15

el rey se assento a yantar Cron 349b20

desque se assento a yantar Cron 694a31

atreuverse.

The preposition a here introduces practically a verb object. The infinitive may also be used with de and en, or remain pure. Of these constructions, the prepositional types are most frequent. Again all instances come from the Crónica.

nos atrouieron a poblar Cron 14a37

. . . ques atrouieron a lidiar Cron 19a24

non se atreuie a uenir Cron 20b40

non se atreuie a yr Cron 20b43

non se atreuieron a dezir que . . . Cron 233b20

non auie y omne que se atrouesse a amparar et defender Cron 315a6

se atrouieran a uenirla guerrear Cron 363a2

non me atreuo a lidiar nin a defenderme Cron 411a3

non nos atreuemos a fazer ninguna cosa sin el Cron 414b46

Also: Cron 292b20, 541b25, 652a48, 666b51, 674b36, 732a38, 750a3, 755a35, 765a28.

ayuntarse.

The a-infinitive here rather expresses the purpose than the goal of the action. This verb appeared currently as a transitive, and took the infinitive with por and pora as well as a.

. . . que se ayuntassen a defender la fe Cron 449a46

cogerse.

As with tomarse and acoyerse, a clearly indicates the goal of the action.

cogios a uenir Cron 83b14

cogiosse a foyr Cron 702a44

cuytarse.

se cuytaran a salir Cron 758b30

darse.

The only infinitive construction of darse has a. This is quite natural in view of the fact that dar as a transitive verb might normally take an indirect object, and that a was used to indicate this object (cf. se dio alli a malas costumbres, et a yr por su talante, Cron 169a41). Dar likewise implies motion, so that a would be normal with dependent infinitive. The locution darse a guarir is noteworthy, with guarir sometimes marked as a substantive: dieron se a guarir, Alix 734 and 1057; dieronse al guarir, Alix 1719, and Date al guarir luego, Sac 724. The majority of the instances of darse with dependent infinitive are found in the Crónica.

dieron se a correr Alix 1728

dar se ya a morir Cron 91b34

se dava a entender Cron 236b23

dieronse a folgar Cron 256a13

dieron se ellos a foyr Cron 310a16

Also: Cron 324a36, 342a4, 404a37, 421a37, 670a29.

echarse.

This verb shows marked similarity to darse, etc. The preposition a regularly indicates the goal of the action. Three instances appear in the Alixandre, the rest in the Crónica. The only current locution is echarse a dormir, found rather often. As with darse, no other infinitive construction is noted with echarse.

El pecado que nunca se echo a dormir Alix 1879

echos a dormir Cron 38b11

Also: Cron 127b51, 128a44, 184a48.

echosse a obrar Cron 658b32

In two passages the infinitive has the same relation to the verb as the substantives used under the same circumstances and at the same time (see discussion under darse above):

se echauan a nobleza et a mas ualer Cron 156b40

echo se a vicio et a folgar et a usar de todas malas costumbres

Cron 168a12

esforçarse.

De- and pora-infinitives are also noted with esforçarse.

esforçosse a fazelles quanto mal pudo Cron 30a37

leuantarse.

The a-infinitive indicates both goal and purpose in the instances below. De, por and pora with the infinitive, as well as the pure construction, are also found with leuantarse.

se començaua a leuantar a seer por si ell regno de Portogal
Cron 650a34

a penas se pudieron leuantar a recibirle Cron 665b24

meterse.

The similarity in sense and syntax of meterse and tomarse is to be noted. Menéndez Pidal gives the modern equivalent as ponerse, also with a-infinitive.¹ Only two instances of meterse with a-infinitive appear in the poetry, all the rest in the Crónica.

métense a andar Cid 2878

al ferir se metieron SMill 442 (with substantive-infinitive)

se metie . . . a amparar el so fecho Cron 20b19

metios . . . a entrar por medio dell agua Cron 71b54

metieron se a andar Cron 72b11

metieron se a destroyr toda tierra de Ytalia Cron 168a21

se metieron a robar Cron 290a39

metiose el rey . . . a fazer obras de misericordia Cron 406a41

Also: Cron 451a19, 475b15, 522a13, 673b1.

mouerse.

The transitive and intransitive, as well as reflexive, forms of mouer are used. Pora-infinitive is also found with the reflexive; the other constructions with a, pora and pure.

Mouieronse a andar Alix 1712

adubdar non te mueuas SDom 713

non se mouer a ferir Cron 75b9

pararse.

Pora-infinitive also occurs with pararse.

parosse a almorzar Cron 115b6

tomarse.

The Cid and the Crónica share equally the examples of tomarse. Menéndez Pidal¹ gives the locution an inceptive sense along with pensar de, conpeçar de, etc. He observes that the romances usually prefer the synonym of tomarse, i.e. prenderse, unknown in the Cid. In one instance he finds no inceptive sense, Cid 1102: tomós a maravillar. However, in the vast majority of passages this inceptive sense is clearly felt. No other infinitive construction is available with tomarse.

moros e moras tomáronse a quexar Cid 852

Viólo mio Çid, tomós a maravillar Cid 1102

tómanse a deportar Cid 1514

tómanse a preguntar Cid 1825

tomaron se a reir del Cron 32b15

tomaron se a robar et a despechar los cibdadanos Cron 284b17

tomose entones a sonrisar Cron 374b7

tomaronse a riir Cron 432a5

tornarse.

For discussion of the intransitive construction of tornar with infinitive, see § 42. Examples of the reflexive construction illustrate both senses of tornar (to turn, to return, to doing something). The iterative sense of tornar is evidenced in the following instances: torno-se a fazer cuemo primero todo lo peor, Cron 124b16; . . . se tornasse a uiuir uida de omne simple, Cron 183b16; tornaron se de cabo a auer sos consules cuemo los ouieran antes, Cron 86b29. Elsewhere the normal sense of to turn, to set oneself, to doing makes the locution resemble tomarse, meterse, etc. above. The de-, para- and pora-infinitives are also used with tornarse, and, with the intransitive tornar, de, en, para, as well as the construction without preposition.

tornós a sonrisar Cid 298, 1266

tornauanse a comer las yeruas Cron 583b36

tornosse a guerrear Cron 581a38; also Alix 2361

treuerse.

Like atreuverse above, treuerse takes a to introduce practically an infinitive object. The pure infinitive is regular with treuerse.

non me trevria en ello a venir Mil 45

non se treue a firmar lo que . . . Cron 491b25

vezarse.

The pure infinitive is also used with vezarse.

THE A-INFINITIVE WITH TRANSITIVE VERBS

44. The group of transitive verbs taking a with the infinitive is smaller and, on the whole, less representative than the groups recently discussed (e.g. the intransitive verbs of motion and the reflexives). There are only three verbs of this class frequently met in the texts under consideration: ayudar, dar and enbiar. The prevailing function of the preposition a is to indicate the goal of the action (to, toward): ayudauan le a mantener el regno, Cron 16b43; los tornara a obedecer el senorio de Roma, Cron 158b17. Occasionally, as in the last few sections, a passage will emphasize the purpose element of the preposition: pidio abeuer, SDom 306; diogelo abeuer, SDom 307. Mouer and tornar are found among these transitives, although they are more regularly used as intransitive verbs of motion. Dar offers a number of delicate problems discussed below.

This verb illustrates the normal use of the a-infinitive to indicate the goal of the action.

los aduxieron a seer pocos Cron 4b1

. . . fasta quem aduxo a casar con estotro Cron 42a16

ayudar.

This is one of the most frequent verbs of the transitive group taking a-infinitive, the preposition regularly indicating the goal of the action with ayudar. The pure infinitive and that with pora also appear in the ayudar locution, though more rarely: Se Dios me aiudase la uoluntad complir, Sac 145. The Crónica yields all except three of the numerous examples cited below.

- ruego . . . que me ayude a rogar Cid 363
- tu nos ayuda las almas asaluar SDom 766
- ayudol el diablo aprender la soldada Sac 210
- . . . que los ayudassen a librar daquella coyta Cron 15b53
- ayudauan le a mantener el regno Cron 16b43
- . . . quel ayudassen a deffender Roma Cron 20b8
- . . . quel ayudassen a cercar la uilla Cron 35b43
- . . . por tal que ge lo ayude a auer Cron 299a20
- . . . que gelo ayudassen a mantener Cron 324b28
- ayudol ella misma a armar Cron 341a45

Also: Cron 345a7, 346b48, 379b19, 429b27, 445b4, 518a25, 547b17, 547b40, 548a22, 548a24, 555b12, 559a21, 561a21, 561a48, 572b20, etc.

dar.

Concerning dar with a-infinitive Menéndez Pidal states:¹ "La preposición a otras veces sirve para marcar el fin: Dio a partir estos dineros, Cid 804." This is found to be relatively true of all the other instances of dar a with infinitive. The statement of Diez² is not at all contradictory to this when he says that dar with infinitive may be equivalent to lasciare (hence dexar in Old Spanish), in the sense of permitting. This is stated for the pure infinitive by Diez. Only one example of this principle is found in our texts: Porque daban al pueblo beber de buen castigo, SOría 60. In this passage beber is an active infinitive object of daban, not a noun as beber often is; thus the idea of permitting or causing can be felt in daban rather than its literal sense of giving. The poet uses both the pure and a-infinitives with equivalent sense in: Tu me da bien empezar, tu me da bien a complir, Loor 3. The introduction of a before the infinitive gives a sense of goal to the action that does not conspicuously interfere with this idea of permitting or causing: entre tales omnes me dieron a beuir, Alix 926; bien a beber me diestes, Sig 28; me das a veyer tamaña alegría, Alix 945; tan grandes quebrantos nos dieron a veyer, Alix 1422; Ruega . . . que nos de en cabo a ueer la su faz, SDom 772. The goal of a merges into a more definite purpose in diogelo a beuer, SDom 307; sy non ouieral dado venino a beuer, Alix 627; dyol mucho a ganar, Alix 981; dieron la a criar a un hermano, Cron 33a36; yl dan alguna animalia a matar, Cron 74b1. The passive sense seems to make itself felt in the infinitive from time to time, though in most cases the sense is satisfied by either the active or passive rendering, as was generally true of fazer and infinitive. It is quite natural, however, to feel a passive sense in such instances as lo dió a criar, Mil 579; yl dan alguna animalia a matar, Cron 74b1. In passages having beber it is sometimes easy to read a noun value into the infinitive, though not when a is used. It is clearly a noun in Diol beber tan amargo que peor non podria, since it is modified by an adjective. In diogelo abeuer, SDom 307, it is clearly a verb as well as in bien a beber me diestes, Sig 28, and venino a beuer, Alix 627. The de-infinitive is also used with dar: dauan de comer, Cron 523b25 (for other verbs taking de- and a-infinitives with quite similar sense, see auer, ser and tener, § 45).

- dieronte a matar a los tus amigos Alix 1630
- yo a ti lo diera todo a ordenar Alix 1759
- diol a criar al rey Cron 7b45
- dieron la a criar a un hermano Cron 33a36
- non querie dar esto a entender Cron 53a45
- yl dan alguna animalia a matar Cron 74b1

Also: Alix 1630, 1759; Cid 3381; Cron 706a15.

endereçar.

Por- and pora-infinitives also occur with endereçar.

- endereçarie al malo a fazer bien Cron 85b4

enbiar (enu-).

The infinitive with por and pora, as well as without preposition, is also noted with enbiar. The function of the preposition is clearly that of goal (quando alguno enuiauan a conquerir tierra, Cron 24b1), becoming purpose when enbiar has an indirect object which assumes to itself the goal element naturally associated with enbiar (enuiaron . . . los mandaderos al rey . . . a dezirle que . . ., Cron 391a9). As has been most often found with verbs taking the a-infinitive, a majority of the available instances come from the late prose-text, the Crónica. Enbiar and its infinitive may each have direct and indirect objects, and the position of these objects is not fixed, so that the context often has to be resorted to in order to determine with which verb a given object functions: a rogar uos enbian, SDom 278; enbiol a dezir . . ., Alix 1571. Enbiar a dezir is the most frequent enbiar locution and dezir usually takes the indirect object despite its occasional position with enbiar (enbioles a dezir en paz e en amor que catasen a el por su enperador, Alix 1112).

With this verb of motion, a with the infinitive naturally indicates the goal of the action, yet in actual instances it expresses rather more of purpose. The dependent infinitive is susceptible of the passive sense mentioned for such phrases as dar a entender (see dar above). All citations come from the prose Crónica. The only notable locution is leuar a enterrar.

leuaronle a enterrar Cron 449b21, 714b39, 453b15
 leuauanlo todo a vender Cron 569a15 le leuuan a abeurar Cron 641a46

meter.

The only locution to be specially noted for this verb is meter a leer, in which poner may replace meter (Mahomet fue puesto a leer, Cron 263a26). Meter also takes the infinitive with en and por.

El padre de siete años metiole a leer Alix 16
 metieron lo a leer Cron 164a41
 metiolas a cometer fuertes fechos Cron 229a9
 metamos mano a destroyr los gascones Cron 286a24
 metiolas luego a leer Cron 483b31

mostrar.

As a transitive, mostrar is practically equivalent to ensennar. It also takes the pure infinitive. The personal object of mostrar is noted as direct.

et de las mostrar a ferir de segures et . . . a tirar dardos Cron 126a52 mostrolos a lidiar et a combatersse et a ser caçadores Cron 483b33

mouer (-v-).

Besides its transitive use, mouer appears as intransitive and as reflexive, all three constructions taking a-infinitive to indicate the goal of the action.

Puedes mover a omne a fer desaguisado SLaur 39
 le mouieron ya descubiertamientra a cometer esta batalla Cron 67a19

pedir.

As with dar above, the a-infinitive with pedir expresses purpose.

pidio abeuer SDom 306

poner.

This is an excellent illustration of the a-infinitive expressing goal. En-infinitive is also noted with poner. Meter is used as well as poner in the locution poner a leer, cited below (metieron lo a leer, Cron 164a41).

Mahomat fue puesto a leer Cron 263a26

tornar.

This verb is much more frequent as an intransitive verb of motion, and as a reflexive. No other infinitive constructions are noted with the transitive use of the verb.

los tornara a obedecer el sennorio de Roma Cron 158b17

THE A-INFINITIVE WITH AUER AND SER

auer.

reasonably be called the Romance languages, the sense of possibility, which becomes the regular future and conditional, and that of necessity, which is preserved in the prepositional constructions, were struggling for the supremacy. Although with the earliest Spanish documents the two senses were becoming fixed in what was to be their permanent form (futurity in the pure infinitive construction, and necessity in that with a and de) the changing conditions can be easily perceived and studied. For one thing, the two verbs going to make up this practical future and conditional could be separated by a personal pronoun. This is quite current in the early texts, occurring over fifty times in the Cid, and commonly in other works (ir lo hemos buscar, Cid 1438; ser lo he de veluntad, Cid 1447; Semeiar mie, señores, si a todos vos plaz . . . Sac 157).

Menéndez Pidal¹ discusses these constructions thus: "Muchas veces, al lado de la preposición de, se emplea también a indistintamente. Tal es el caso con los auxiliares que rigen infinitivo para formar una expresión perifrástica de la voz activa con diversos matices de significación: — auer expresa la necesidad, rigiendo al infinitivo ora con de . . . ora con a. La preposición falta rara vez, acaso sólo en: los que han lidiar, Cid 3523 . . . El pretérito, rigiendo á un infinitivo con de o a, expresa no la necesidad, sino un acaecimiento subsiguiente ó futuro respecto al tiempo pretérito de una narración." These statements, though in general true, will permit some slight modification. First, there is no reference here to the exact function of the preposition. Secondly, the statement that the preterit does not on occasion express necessity can with difficulty be proved. The prepositional function that needs mention here, and that serves to clarify to a considerable extent the locution discussed, is that one already so often found in the preposition a, goal. This was pointed out by Meyer-Lübke, who considers habere ad to date back to a period before Romance, and goal to be the concept inherent in it. The situation can be better visualized from the English locutions

I have it to do, and I have to do it. In the first phrase, the concept of goal can be clearly felt while that of necessity is undeveloped though present, but in the second phrase the element of necessity springs to view full-grown. In Old Spanish decided evidences of this original concept of goal are to be noted, and numerous delicate shades intermediate between the two extremes of goal and necessity. Similarity of form does not indicate similarity of sense in these instances of auer with the infinitive. The citations below are admittedly debatable, but give clear enough indications of the goal element in auer with a-infinitive verging upon simple futurity, and not necessity. It will be remarked that no instance of the preterit (ouo) is included here, this tense of auer with prepositional infinitive alone being excepted by Menéndez Pidal from the expression of necessity.

Fijo, sy de buena ventura as a seyer,
o sy en este siglo algo as a valer,
en muchas grandes cueytas te avras a veyer Alix 64

Entiende, Alixandre, que te quiero fablar,

(In this instance, ha . . . a dexar largely expresses necessity, han . . . a lograr goal, as can be felt in the English he has to leave it all and they have it to gain.)

The following examples are given of the preterit having necessity implied in them. Menéndez Pidal considers the preerit ouo to express only un acaecimiento subsiguiente ó futuro respecto al tiempo pretérito de una narración, and cites Alix 2082 with no special comment on its element of necessity.

Pero tanto ovieron contender e buscar,
Fasta que lo ovieron en cabo a fallar.

It would seem to me that the first line, which is the one in question, contains the element of necessity quite clearly, while the second, unmentioned, evidences little if any necessity. The lack of a preposition in the first line has no visible effect on the sense; nor is any reason given for functionally distinguishing ouieron from its singular ouo.

In the Cid 1145 occurs a clear instance of necessity in the preterit (Menéndez Pidal cites this case and 953 both under auer expressing necessity and along with the preterit ouo (see above)):

Del otra part entróles Álbar Fáñez,
Maguer les pesa, oviéronse a dar e a arrancar Cid 1145

Other illustrations of necessity with ouo or ouieron:

ouieron a tollerse del portillo syn grado Alix 214

ouieron los griegos las rriendas a boluer Alix 498

ovieronle syn grado el canpo a dexar Alix 645

conterta como a Luçifer que tanto quiso subyr, desenparolo Dios et ovo a perir Alix 781

Ovose de las cuevas por esso arrancar,
Ca non querie al so grado el voto quebrantar SMill 46

The above discussion and examples, intended to show that the preterit of the auer locution (ouo and ouieron) could carry the sense of necessity, does not try to disprove Menéndez Pidal's main point. The preterit usually does act as he so clearly states, and it is only in sporadic passages that the element of necessity can be proved. In numerous cases, however, it is apparently a fusion of necessity and futurity rather than either sense alone that is implied. The following are cited from the Cid by Menéndez Pidal in this connection:

ouieron te a laudare Cid 335

ovieron a morar Cid 953 (see p. 182 above)

oviéronse a dar e a arrancar Cid 1145 (see p. 182 above)

ovieron a enbiar Cid 1181

oviérongela a dar Cid 1210

Other instances of the preterit of the auer locution with various shades of futurity and necessity follow:

ouo a vencerlos Alix 151

ouos de la reyna fuerte a enamorar Alix 154

ouo lo a pedir Alix 165

ouolo a vençer Alix 166

This is an appropriate place to consider the matter of possible absorption of a in the auer locution, which might affect a number of our citations. By absorption of a is meant here the disappearance of the preposition a before or after a juxtaposed a. Absorption of vowels doubtless operated in Old Spanish, as proved by Menéndez Pidal for the Cid, and as clearly shown by Professor Fitzgerald for the Santo Domingo de Silos. Professor Fitzgerald offers excellent material for discussion of the phase of the subject interesting the auer locution, since he finds a number of examples of possible absorption of the preposition a, and, if the principle is proved for the cases he cites, it might equally well apply here.

The first passage, cited by Professor Fitzgerald as showing absorption of a is:

El padre cordojoso entro asu altar,
como era usado, al Criador rogar, in which al is of course the absorbing word. But if the principle is accepted in this instance, it would normally be accepted in three others:

entro el ala iglesia, al criador rogar SDom 300
entro a la iglesia rogar al Criador SDom 409
Entro ala iglesia al Criador rogar SDom 425

In the poem from which all these four doubtful cases come there is only one passage in which the preposition a is clearly used with entrar, and that is:

Entro enna mañana ala mjssa dezir SDom 346

Against four cases that might be considered as instances of pure infinitive with verbs of motion, one of the most frequent and unquestionable infinitive constructions of the early language, there is only one passage in this or in the other poems by Berceo to indicate his preference for the a-infinitive with entrar. On the other hand, he wittingly employs the pure infinitive in four cases, where there is no possible reason for supposing it absorbed:

Entró el sacristano el sepulcro catar SMill 335
Por entrar a la missa la confession façer Mil 71
Entró fer oração el novio refrescado Mil 338
. . . Que pueda entrar entro veer la magestad Mil 768

Judging, then, from Berceo's own treatment of the entrar locutions, it must be said that there is much more evidence against absorption in these cases than for it. Why, indeed, is it necessary to suppose that this principle operated in these doubtful instances of the entrar locution? I do not see that it is necessary, since the pure infinitive answers all needs of the passages, and is sanctioned by the author as sufficient. The fact that it is poetry that is being discussed also has some bearing on the matter, since the a-infinitive was used more rarely in the poetry than in the prose of this period. This is seen to be true by comparing the citations from prose and poetry under any of the verbs of motion of this chapter. It will be found that a was customary in prose texts such as the Crónica for the greater number of these verbs, but was often peculiarly rare in the poetry of the same general period. It was probably a matter of temporary convenience that decided whether or not Berceo employed a in these instances.

Two more passages are cited to show absorption of a:

començo muy afirmes al Criador rogar SDom 450

ante començo el la açada buscar SDom 726

Here Professor Fitzgerald takes al and açada as the absorbing words. He states that a or de was nearly always required with comenzar and infinitive, and that Cuervo only gives one instance of the omission of the preposition with comenzar. But, as also remarked by the editor, it is significant that at least one passage in this same poem has no a with the infinitive, and permits no explanation of such omission through absorption: comenzaron los monges las campañas tañer, SDom 568. If Berceo omits the preposition here, it is reasonable to suppose he may omit it elsewhere if evidence shows that such treatment was by no means rare in this period. Nine examples of the pure infinitive with comenzar are available from the few texts herein studied, none of them permitting absorption to be considered as the cause of the absence of a:

començo darle guerra Alix 402

Començol mal traher con palabras yradas Alix 451

Començol dar priesa Alix 685

començaron guerrear luego Cron 219a6

Also: Cron 605a46, 653b19, 684b32, 741a50.

There are enough examples of the pure infinitive with comenzar, then, to seem to indicate that the two cases in question would be by no means irregular, if considered as instances of the pure infinitive object with comenzar, no question being raised as to the possible disappearance of the preposition.

Professor Fitzgerald further states: "One might be tempted to count as another case of a embedida after fue the verse fue caer al sepulcro del confessor honrado, SDom 669." In such a case it seems to me that there can be no valid reason for considering the possibility of absorption, since, in the first place, in the Santo Domingo itself there are eleven cases of yr with pure infinitive against five with a-infinitive. The pure infinitive with yr was, indeed, more regular in the poetry of the period than was the prepositional infinitive (the Alixandre yields about twice as many instances of the construction without preposition as it does with a, i.e. 56 and 29 respectively). There is of course the further fact that absorption of a by the e of fue would be quite abnormal. But it should be added, in justice to Professor Fitzgerald, that he suggests rather than affirms absorption of a to be operative in this verse, and states himself that yr does not require the preposition.

The conclusion that I wish to emphasize is that, whereas absorption did doubtless operate in certain instances and in certain conditions, it must not be assumed, just because there is an a in juxtaposition, as operative with the preposition a in those instances where the pure infinitive is used. The pure infinitive should be considered regular and normal until the evidence is conclusive in favor of voluntary omission of the preposition.

The application of the above discussion on the immediate problem of auer with the a-infinitive is obvious. The preposition is lacking in a fair number of instances of this locution, and, where possible, the temptation would be felt to consider absorption as responsible, but in view of the evidence given above, absorption will not be postulated as operative in these passages. They will then, until further evidence is at hand, be classed as instances of the pure infinitive construction.

A few facts should be mentioned concerning the doubtful cases of this auer locution, however. In Berceo's own works the pure infinitive is found in seven passages. In only one of these is there a neighboring a:

Por que en tal periglo nos aves a uviar
Por el tu guyonage avemos arrivar,
Et de aquellas ondas tan fuertes escapar Loor 197

The sense does not require a separate preposition here. It is of course possible to explain the form arrivar as the scribe's writing for a rivar, or as a real instance of the absorption of a. However, the most natural assumption is that it is the regular pure infinitive object with auer, and that any ingenious explanation is unnecessary, since the use or omission of the preposition would not alter the sense of the passage. In the Alixandre, there are over three hundred cases of a with auer against a negligible number in which there is any possibility of absorption. Of these few, one has the neighboring a in another hemistich, a fact which would naturally militate against its being explained by this principle. On the other hand, there are over thirty cases where the preposition a is permitted by the poet to stand in hiatus with another a. It would appear, then, that when he employed the pure infinitive, he did so voluntarily, and not because it was objectionable to have the preposition stand in juxtaposition with another a. As this was the same ancient construction that had developed, in different order and with different sense, into the Romance future, the poet might occasionally use it, and consider that tradition consecrated its employment, especially as the prepositional construction was a recent development of the language.

Instances of juxtaposed a:¹

Los que . . . han alimosna pedir Alix 1596

Avremos . . . la cosa destajar Alix 2045

As is seen by comparing the citations with and without a, there is scarcely ever any difficulty in the sense of the passages, nor does the presence or the absence of the preposition affect the sense. In the same way it is difficult to see any appreciable difference in meaning between the auer a and the auer de constructions. The original function of the prepositions has become very faint indeed, and scholars such as Diez and Menéndez Pidal make little or no distinction between these prepositional uses of auer. Auer a is far more common than auer de in the texts studied, but by the time of Santillana, the de-infinitive had definitely won the victory.¹

Diez¹ considers esse ad to be the passive of habere ad and de. He cites an infinitive construction found in Latin that would seem at first to be the parent of the Romance form. Latin est dicere, est credere, etc. only expressed possibility (never the perifrastic sense of the auer and ser locutions), and were used impersonally while the derived languages regularly permit personal use in these constructions. Menéndez Pidal² agrees with Diez in calling ser a the passive of auer a, and adds that the modern equivalents are the impersonal hay que (for such cases as es a fer, Cid 2995), and haber de with intransitives (for a passar es por nos, Cid 3528, etc.). The texts studied offer only a small number of examples of ser with a-infinitive in comparison with the much more active auer locution. Practically all texts are represented, however. The infinitive constructions with a and de are found in about the same number of passages, and show great similarity of sense and treatment. For ser with de-infinitive, see § 31.

THE INFINITIVE WITH POR

46. It will be remembered that expression of purpose was remarked as one of the functions of the preposition a. It was not, however, stated as its most characteristic or primary sense. Purpose is the most characteristic phase of por, and derives from the Latin pro. It expresses the purpose of an action more naturally and more vividly than the general and varied a-construction. Menéndez Pidal gives as the three concepts involved in por:¹

1. la falta de realización de la acción del infinitivo regido
2. el fin
3. el motivo

This sums up in brief the most important functions of por, though each of the above subdivisions is sufficiently broad to deserve considerable individual attention. Yet these are the three basic senses of por that are seen so currently in Old Spanish. The first is largely confined to the verbs ser, estar, auer, fincar, and yazer (li estaba por exir la almiella, SMill 343; yazie por morirse, Cron 717b13). It is also responsible in large part for the independent por-infinitive, such as por poblar e pobladas, SMill 477. The second is quite general, covering as did a, the transitives, intransitives, reflexives (adobar, andar, guisarse: anda por la fe guerrear, SLaur 29; guisosse por yr a ueella, Cron 38b19). The class of por-infinitives denoting purpose and depending on a whole clause is larger than that with any other preposition. The relation between the infinitive and the finite verb of the sentence may vary in intensity from that of object-infinitive, in which the relation is at its closest, to that of dependence on the whole clause, in which the relation is at its weakest. Examples of the more evident relations will be given below. The por-infinitive in the third sense mentioned above (cause) usually does not depend on any single verb (era aquel puerto tenido por el mejor de toda Africa, por estar y nauios en todo tiempo, Cron 48b19).

¹ See also Hanssen, Gram., pp. 303–307.

One territory in which a does not at all rival por is in use with adjectives and participles. This is one of the strongest classes of por-infinitives, while with a it is almost non-existent.

An illustration of the difficulty met in classifying instances of the por-infinitive is found in the listing by Meyer-Lübke¹ under purpose clauses of the following: no lo querie nul hombre por derecho juzgar, Por tu dormir con ella e nos yr a lidiar, Alix 454; and entraron en Estremadura por ser tierra rica, Nov. ej., 27. The first of these citations offers a very delicate problem, but that Por tu dormir here expresses purpose seems to me highly improbable. It would be more natural to consider the whole clause introduced by por as being in apposition with lo, since it is the sense of the whole clause that is judged as not right. Indeed, it would be as good a construction, and certainly more regular, simply to omit the por entirely, in which case the infinitive would be considered as a substantive in apposition with lo, and a normal sentence result (cf. lo que era peor de todo, uenir los d'Africa a Roma, Cron 45a49, § 79). The second citation is fortunately much simpler than this, and permits easy recognition of the por-infinitive expressing the cause of the action (cf. se preciauan por alançar, Cron 431b31, § 56). The por-infinitive also expresses concession, and indicates the means of an action: concession in Ca esto que uos queredes aun por seer uençudos, lo que Dios no quiera, podedes lo fazer en el cabo, Cron 73b20; and the means of the action in sy omne non gana prez por dezir o por fer, Alix 71).

THE POR-INFINITIVE WITH A SUBSTANTIVE

47. There are certain cases in which the por-infinitive depends on a noun rather than on an individual verb. These are rare at best, and the relations involved are sometimes loose, but certain instances of infinitive usage can be explained by no other theory (e.g. el plazdo por el reyno quitar,

Cid 392, cited by Menéndez Pidal). Other passages offering somewhat similar constructions are found as follows:

- Puerta de pecadores por al cielo entrar Himnos 2. 1
 el plazdo por el reyno quitar Cid 392
 dos pedones solos por la puerta guardar Cid 686
 Non es agora tiempo por en naves entrar SOria 159
 Nol dolie so lazerio por las almas salvar SMill 282 por entrar a los cielos sangue faz el camino Sac 98
 por depanar los buenos busca siempre sendero Alix 1948

In the last citation above, busca sendero may be taken as governing por depanar, rather than the noun sendero alone. Of the same type is noted another buscar locution: Por yra Paraysobuscaualis carrera, SDom 464. As can be seen in such cases, the infinitive but rarely offers clear evidence of depending on the noun alone.

THE POR-INFINITIVE DEPENDS ON AN ADJECTIVE

48. With adjectives por nearly always indicates purpose, and the infinitive is very rarely susceptible of a passive sense, as in la correl es viunrosa, buena por alargar, Alix 2109. Generally, when such a relation is to be expressed, the preposition de appears (digno de adorar, SDom 253). With these adjectives, the past participles of various verbs are included (osado, pagado, etc.), even though at times their verbal force somewhat exceeds their adjectival sense (uenido, etc.). The exact gradation of adjectival and of verbal force is of course indeterminate, though examples of both extremes are available. For instance, osado has lost most of its participial value, while vestido has little else: por canpear a ellos sol non somos osados, Alix 596; Velmezes vestidos por sufrir las guarnizones, Cid 3073. Only the more striking syntactical relations will be pointed out under the various adjectives and participles. The infinitive with de, en, para and para is also found in adjectival constructions (eran buenas para ganar e deffender tierra, Cron 22a3; en veer muy certeros, Sig 55; nunca para comer vi cosa tan ligera, Alix 799; ligera de fazer, Cron 420b11).

Participles.

More variety of sense and of usefulness is found in the participles taking the por-infinitive than in the regular adjectives above. This might be expected from their having both verbal and adjectival force, thus facilitating many fine distinctions in function and connotation. Representatives of most of the other classes of verbs taking por-infinitive are noted here, such as venido for the intransitive verbs of movement, enviado for the transitives, etc. (fui . . . enviado Por recibir martirio, seer crucifigado, Duelo 82; por vengar mi despecho deves seyer pagado, Alix 2413). These instances and a number of others might well be cited under the verb itself rather than under the participle, but are given here for purposes of comparison. Certain participles allow themselves to be grouped together because of similarity of meaning, such as those equivalent to the English prepared for, ready to, etc. These naturally take the por-infinitive in the majority of instances, though they can, with a slight shift of sense, have the preposition de. They are fairly numerous, but with sufficient individual force to keep them from being real synonyms. Of these the most important are: adobado, aguisado, aparecido, apareiado, guisado (por batalla le dar estaua aguisado, Alix 1165; estaua el bien guisado por yr a Espanna, Cron 101b11). Others express in varying quality attitude toward or desire for something: adenodado, asaborgado, auiuado, cuytado, demetido, denodado, endiablado, pagado, saborgado. In any case, the prevailing concept in the por-infinitive with these participles is that of purpose, more definite than in a, less definite than in pora and para. Few of the participles noted below occur more than once (viz., aguisado, apareiado, denodado, guisado). The Crónica shows a preference for the pora-infinitive, and the poetry for the construction with por (apareiado pora foyr, Cron 379b33; fueron apareiados por fer su cumplimiento, SDom 615). The para-infinitive is strangely lacking with participles, though used with adjectives (buenas . . . para librar sus moros, Cron 746a50). Andar and venir give greater vividness of expression than ser and estar when used as auxiliaries with these participles (por dar en Alixandre andauan acordados, Alix 1339; por feryr a Nicanor vino muy demetido, Alix 1011).

aguisado (considerably the most frequent of these participles with the por-infinitive; also used with de-infinitive; cf. guisado below). The use of mal and bien with aguisado is particularly to be noted.

por defendernos somos mal aguisados Alix 873

THE POR-INFINITIVE AS OBJECT

49. The origin of this construction lies in the purpose sense so regular in por. It often seems a far cry to hark back to this basic relation between verb and infinitive, as the tendency is to make the connection so close that the two are thought of as almost a unit. This is, of course, characteristic of the object relation and the more frequent the locution is, the closer the two parts become in the mind of the speaker. The most highly developed example of this is the Romance future, where the two parts do become in fact a unit (dar-e, je donnerai, etc.). Here there was no preposition, so the component parts were permitted to stand together. With por, this closeness of relation is vastly weakened, yet there is a certain sense of unity to be felt between verb and infinitive. Only about ten verbs are included in this group, none of them very common with por-infinitive in the early language, but having when so used a shade of meaning (will or purpose) that cannot be found in their more frequent de- or *a-*locutions (cobdiciando casar, Cron 454a18; andauan cobdiciando por auer la guardia del ninno, Cron 669a19; cobdiciaua de seer el solo sennor de tod ell imperio, Cron 81a5; cobdigiaua mucho a ueer la su muerte, Cron 429a2). As seen in these citations, the de-infinitive breaks the absolute object relation less than the infinitive with either a or por (cf. the antiquated and vulgar he hoped for to go).

The de-infinitive occurs with aguisado. The transitive and reflexive forms are noted with pora.

Estaua aguisando por entrar en carrera Alix 1623
catar.

This is one of the more natural of the por-locutions (cf. English to look for). The pure infinitive occurs once, but in sense like ver, etc. The similarity in construction of the por-infinitive with al is to be noted in the first citation below.

non cato por al sinon por aguijar el cauallo Cron 404a36 catando por librar a su sennor Cron 670b30
 cataron por contender en matar los enemigos Cron 704a19

cobdiçiar.

The pure, a- and de-infinitives are also noted with cobdiçiar (cf. English to wish for).

andauan cobdiçiendo por auer la guardia del ninno Cron 669a19
dexar.

With the por-infinitive dexar has the sense of to leave off, hence to cease, to fail to, the same as with the de- and a-infinitives, as contrasted with its pure infinitive use of to leave in the sense of to allow (cf. the English vulgarism leave him do it).

plogo a Dios que non dexassen por enssayar el castiello, maguer que semeiaua grieue de combater Cron 695b27 endurar.

This verb approximates the sense of sufrir. No other infinitive use is noted.

Mas el non enduro por y gelo lleuar Alix 202

pedir.

Like catar, pedir would seem a natural member of this class (cf. English to ask for, etc.), though the only example at hand has both noun object and por-infinitive taking that object as subject:

piden sus fijas a mio Cid el Campeador, por seer reinas de Navarra e de Aragón Cid 3399

pensar.

This verb takes the infinitive with a and de, as well as without preposition, but the de-construction is alone frequent.

penso por yr a Libia Alix 1148

poner.

The de-infinitive is more common than the por-construction with poner. En-and a-infinitives also occur, but not with objective function. The contrast in por-infinitives in this case is interesting: .

han puesto por matarlo, por aver los onores Alix 1709

yurar (j-).

The de-infinitive is found more currently with this verb.

los nuestros enemigos jurado an por tener con la nemiga et desapoderar a nos Cron 74a5

ambos son sobre ti por matarte jurados Alix 1669

POR-INFINITIVE WITH TRANSITIVE VERBS (OBJECT PRESENT)

50. This class includes such verbs as adobar, aguisar and combidar, which generally take a noun or pronoun object as well as the por-infinitive. They are entirely normal in their construction, as can be seen from the predominance of the sense of purpose in the por. The difference between this group and the last one discussed (por-infinitive as object) can be seen by comparing instances with and without noun or pronoun object: Estaua aguisando por entrar en carrera, Alix 1623; Aguisaron el cuerpo . . . Por darli sepultura, SMill 312. The most striking illustration is found in dexar (with pronoun object present, the por-infinitive clearly expresses purpose, while without such object and with por, a or de, the locution means to cease, etc.): dexol por enterrar, Cron 674b14; . . . que non dexassen por ensayar el castiello, maguer que semeiaua grieue de combater, Cron 695b27. Although the cases below easily become clear instances of clausal dependence, there is felt to be a greater attraction exerted by the main verb for the por-infinitive than would be found in ordinary dependence of the infinitive on a clause.

The infinitive with de also appears with the transitive adobar. The reflexive likewise takes por-infinitive (estos se adoban por ir con el Campeador, Cid 1997).

adobaua poderes e misiones por venir al campo Alix 2124
aguisar.

Pora-infinitive is also found with the transitive aguisar, and with the reflexive aguisarse.

agujsaron su cosa por fer su romeria SDom 407

Aguisaron el cuerpo . . . Por darli sepultura e ferli proçession SMill 312

. . . como aguisarie poyo . . . por veyer todo el mundo Alix 2460

combidar.

Combidara los iustos Dios por regnar consigo Loor 175

dexar.

The infinitive is here susceptible of a passive sense; cf. discussion at head of this chapter, and dexar, §49.

dexol por enterrar Cron 674b14

enbiar (enu-).

The pure and a-infinitives are much more frequent with enbiar. The infinitive also occurs sporadically with pora, as with por, emphasizing the element of purpose.

Enbionos . . . por descobrir las cosas que jazen sofondidas Alix 2269

enuio luego tres caualleros . . . por barruntar que poder tenie Cron 26a5 escoger.

De-infinitive is also used with escoger, but clearly as an object infinitive (escogieron de perder antes la franqueza que no la uida, Cron 228a37).

a mi non escogiera por fer su vxor Alix 350

judgar.

The de-infinitive is also used with judgar.

fue judgando el omne por morir e lazrar Alix 2515
meter.

This verb forms a number of interesting noun locutions with por-infinitive, as well as similar constructions with the prepositions de and en (En buscarli serviço methie toda femencia, Mil 50; metie en complirlo toda su voluntad, SDom 263; leuaua en coraçon de matar all yerno, Cron 181a52; . . . que uos meta en coraçon de sacarle ende, Cron 355a20). Purpose shaded with goal is felt in por, as contrasted with the objective de-construction and the purely goal function of en.

meter corazon:

Por fer toda nemiga metien los corazones SMill 221

meter estudio:

Metien bien so estudio por mucho li onrar SMill 307

meter poder:

The de-object occurs most often with prometer.

por partirme del mundo voto e prometido SMill 16

THE POR-INFINITIVE WITH INTRANSITIVE VERBS OF MOTION

51. The reflexives following this group, and these intransitive verbs of motion, form the two largest classes of por-infinitive taking verbs. The intransitives are among the verbs most frequently employed by the language, while the reflexives are used rather sporadically as individual verbs. The por-infinitive defines the purpose of an action more clearly than the pure infinitive or that with a, and rather less clearly than that with pora and para, inasmuch as these last combine the virtues of both por and a (reçebir los sale, Cid 297; saliolos a recibir, Cron 342b47; andaua por casar con ella, Cron 647a23; salió . . . para yr degollar el carnero, Cron 504a51; sedien para oyr la toda la gent quedada, SDom 566). Of these five possible methods of expressing the closely merged relations of goal and purpose, the weaker pure and a-infinitives recur very much more frequently than the others. The para-infinitive did not develop to any great extent until somewhat later in the language. While pora was reserved for the purpose (including goal) sense only, por was more general and might express concession, means, cause, etc. Morir, nacer and contender are included in the list below, although they are not strictly verbs of motion, the first two designating a change of condition and the third implying motion only by its connotation.

The por-infinitive frequently depends on a goal-clause, the main verb of which expresses motion. Such cases may closely resemble the regular construction with these verbs (see § 53, § 62 and § 66 for por- and pora-infinitive in clausal dependence):

yre y . . . por complir uestra uoluntad Cron 435a12

yas mueven adelant por a mio Cid . . . a manos los tomar Cid 701

andar.

Emphasis is indicated in andar by its appearance only once with a, and not at all with pure infinitive, as against six cases with por. This is the converse of the usual situation with verbs of motion (e.g. yr). En-infinitive occurs, but with the place element of en conspicuous (yo ando en seruicio de Dios et en uengar el mal, Cron 564a33). In Paris andaua muerto por a Etor vengar, Alix 705, andaua acts as auxiliary to muerto, there being then no special dependence of the infinitive on andaua.

andaua por casar con ella Cron 647a23

Andaua por mouerlas Alix 236

anda por lo fer Alix 683

El diablo andaba por ferse del seguro Loor 46

Andas por confonder toda christiandat SLaur 43

. . . anda por la fe guerrear,

Quiere fer los cristianos a Christo denegar SLaur 29

contender.

Infinitive constructions with de, pora and en are also noted with conlender. This is in keeping with the unsettled prepositional habits of verbs of striving in general (e.g. punnar, trabaiar).

contendie . . . por fer matar a Etor Alix 662

Contendia por levarlos todos a meioria SMill 96

Contendie el bon omne . . . Por fincar los inoios Mil 489 correr.

No other infinitive construction is noted with correr.

corrien por cevarse Alix 2466

endereçar.

The infinitives with a and pora are also used with endereçar.

endereço por darle del pendon señalado Alix 465

yr.

This verb is frequent in all the infinitive constructions associated with verbs of motion (except the de of separation): a, por, pora, para, and without preposition. The less emphatic constructions occur most often in the poetry (the infinitive being pure or with a), while the few available instances of the por-infinitive definitely dependent on yr come largely from the Crónica. French well illustrates the use of the pure infinitive with its equivalent of yr, expressing the goal (or very weak purpose) of the action (je vais le voir). The inceptive sense of yr with pure infinitive is seen to be intensified by the use of yr directly with por-infinitive (Fue por darle con ella, Alix 470; fue por besar la mano al rey, Cron 419b46; fueron abrazarla, Soria 60). The por-infinitive is more often dependent on an yr-clause than on yr alone: Yban al omne bueno por con el se morar, SMill 253; eran ydos al palacio por oyr aquellas nuevas, Cron 603a23: also Cid 3081; SDom 360; Alix 1697, 2493; Cron 422a25, 435a12.

yua por dar della a Munno Salido Cron 437b30

fue por ferirle con ella Cron 447b43

yua por passar a Siria Cron 544a5

exir, issir.

There is more often dependence of the por-infinitive on an exir clause than on exir alone: querrie del castiello fuera seer exido, Por tornar a los montes, SMill 23; also Alix 321, 653, 735; SDom 455, 764.

Yssieron los de dentro por con ellos lidiar SMill 291

exio . . . por guerrear a Moros, entrar en caualgada SDom 700

morir.

Emphasis is natural to morir, so that it is not surprising to find the por-infinitive used where other weaker infinitive constructions are lacking. The popular English construction he is dying for (a) drink is more or less paralleled in the first citation below.

semeias al itropico que muere por beuer, quanto mas va beuiendo el mas puede arder Alix 1903

murie por ser martir, prender por Dios passion SLaur 23

naçer.

Cf. morir above.

por salvar el mundo naçio SMill 223

The a-infinitive also occurs. This verb is a good illustration of close dependence of the por-infinitive on the verb of motion.

tanto puio la su nemiga por ayuntar et acrecentar en si mas de lixo Cron 304b10

venir (u-).

The pure infinitive and the constructions with a, de and pora are also used with venir. About one half of the available examples of por-infinitive come from the Crónica. The prepositional constructions, here as elsewhere, recur more often in the prose than in the poetry. The Cid, for example, gives only one single instance of venir with por, while the later texts affect the locution with greater frequency. As was true of yr, the por-infinitive is more often dependent on a venir clause than on venir alone: vin a ti por seguir tu mandado, Mil 729; also SMil 483; Mil 137, 729; SDom 476; Alix 680; Cron 360b8, 447b27, 533a21, 548b40, 602b25, 616b48, 642a45.

POR-INFINITIVE WITH REFLEXIVE VERBS

52. The reflexives form a well-recognized group with each of the prepositions expressing purpose (and goal), though none of the verbs cited below for the por-infinitive occur frequently in this use. There is found to be a closer relation of these verbs with the pora-group than with those taking the a-infinitive. In general the a-construction was too weak in its expression of purpose to satisfy the needs of these particular verbs, while pora was even stronger than por in this desired element (combining with por the goal function of a). Guisarse (cf. of the same type adobarse and armarse) undoubtedly illustrates best the kind of verb appearing currently in infinitive constructions having por, pora and para, but not at all in a-constructions (guisosse por yr a ueella, Cron 38b19; guisosse pora yr a Carthago, Cron 25b15; guisandose para venir, Cron 355a43). Motion is actual or implied in abaxarse, ajuntarse, juntarse and leuantarse, while distantly related to this type are escalentarse and trabaiarse. The reflexives readily lend themselves to clausal dependence in the por-infinitive: alçose a la sierra por mas saluo estar, Alix 2076.

abaxosse por besarle los pies Cron 531a36

acordarse.

Infinitive constructions with a, de and en are also found with acordarse.

Acordaron se todos . . . por recebir al rey Alix 2481

adobarse.

No other infinitive constructions are at hand for adobarse, but the transitive adobar takes particularly the de-infinitive.

The pure infinitive and that with de, a, and pora are also used with leuantarse.

trabaiarse.

This verb appears more often with the pure, de- and *en-*infinitives. When with por, there is a definite purpose expressed.

THE POR-INFINITIVE DEPENDS ON A CLAUSE

53. Because of the strength of por, pora and para in the expression of purpose, the infinitive with these prepositions is better suited to dependence on a clause than is either the a-infinitive or that without preposition. The dependence of the por-infinitive at times is so slight that the more pronounced instances may for convenience be termed "independent por-clauses of purpose." The construction of the sentence is usually loose, and the por-clause may have even greater prominence than the clause it is presumed to depend on (Por ferlis bien creencia, por seer bien creido, Disso que a los XXX dias serie transido, Mil 266; Por ganar la Gloriosa que él mucho amaba, Partielo con los pobres todo quanto ganaba, Mil 133).

In Io so aqui venida por levarte contigo, Mil 137, the locative adverb aqui puts the por-infinitive in the category of dependence on a goal-clause, since there is only a question of degree and definiteness between this and such instances as vin a ti por seguir tu mandado, Mil 729; torna a diestro por la missa acabar, Sac 53; Entraron a Pilato por conseio tomar, Duelo 166. An even more inconspicuous type than that with the adverbs of place is at hand in querien . . . llegarsele por dezirle alguna cosa, Cron 449b50, where the le of llegarsele completes the goal-clause quite as effectively as a los montes in Entresti a los montes por a mi querrear, SMill 114. Very often the por-infinitive satisfies the needs of both the individual verb and the clause as well: enuiaua alla Yalia a aquel su privado por saber . . . Cron 548a39; Contendie el buen omne, queriesse levantar, Por fincar los inoios, los piedes li besar, Mil 489. From time to time a notable difference will be found between construction of the por-infinitive with the individual verb and with the clause: e.g. the introduction of al conde breaks the inceptive sense of ir with dependent por-infinitive (fue por besar la mano al rey, Cron 603a23) in fue al conde por pagarle ell auer, Cron 422a25; the use of el cuerpo as object prevents the por-infinitive from itself replacing the object in Aquisaron el cuerpo del precioso varon, Por darli sepultura e ferli proçession, SMill 312. There is usually no difficulty in sense, however, whether the por-infinitive depends on the verb or on the clause: Si viéredes yentes venir por connusco ir, Cid 388; vinieron a estas bodas por onrrar el Cid, Cron 602b25. The por-infinitive sometimes depends on a well-known verb and noun locution, as in por meter se en armas ningunt vagar non se dieron, Alix 586 (darse vagar); Boluio con el guerra por non seyer reptado, Alix 157 (volver guerra).

THE POR-INFINITIVE INDICATES FUTURITY

54. Menéndez Pidal says of this construction:¹ "La preposición por, con los verbos ser ó auer, expresa la falta de realización de la acción del infinitivo regido." In illustration of this principle he cites tres [días] an por troçir, Cid 307. This is not as representative a citation as might be desired, since the por may well be fulfilling here its ordinary function of purpose, and there is no reason why a purpose clause should be limited in time. A better example, cited in the same paragraph as that above, is ninguno sodes por pagar, where por pagar would clearly indicate the unfulfilment of the action were it not for the negative sense of ninguno. The por-infinitive, then, may mark the action of the infinitive as belonging to the future, and with little or no reference as to the actual accomplishment of that action. Even in the cases when the future is indicated as immediate (when por means on the point of, about to) there is nothing to show that the action will be completed (estauan todos por perder se, Cron 76a10).

This class includes such verbs as auer, estar, ser, fincar, and yazer, the latter two of which have not been generally recognized along with the first three in this use. Even with these verbs that take the por-infinitive to express the incompleteness of the action of the infinitive, there is a decided trace of the fundamental function of purpose in por (tres [días] an por troçir, Cid 307). Likewise in por casar son vuestras fijas, Cid 1650, a certain degree of purpose can be felt along with the simple futurity of por casar. In Cid 3283 there is an idiomatic use of auer with por-infinitive that is approximately equal to auer que with infinitive, according to Menéndez Pidal:¹ ¿Qué avedes vos, comde, por retraeer la mi barba? Other illustrations of auer with por-infinitive follow (in each instance the infinitive is far):

non fuera menester que lo ouiese por far	Alix 118
querria lo que fiziera Tebas auer por far	Alix 213

estar.

Meyer-Lübke notes² that stare and essere per (in Spanish and Portuguese ser and estar with por and para) indicate an action as on the point of being accomplished. He does not remark on that kindred sense of por with these verbs, noted by Menéndez Pidal and called falta de realización. There may not be a great difference between these two senses, yet a distinction doubtless exists. While mentioning the Spanish equivalents of stare and essere that have this particular future meaning, Meyer-Lübke mentions estar with por and para but says nothing of ser with these infinitive constructions. Diez¹ points out that ser with por-infinitive indicates possibility. At least it indicates a more indefinite futurity than estar with por, as can be noted by contrasting li estaba por exir la almiella, SMill 343, with lo que es por venir, Alix 1792, and al que es por nascer, Cron 513b17. The sense of the por-infinitive with estar is not entirely consistent, however, as is seen by comparing querrie mas seyer muerto o estar por nascer, Alix 1396, and estaua aun por descabesçar, Cron 441a24, with estauan todos por perder se, Cron 76a10. In the Crónica occur two cases with no indication of immediate futurity: estauan y los cuerpos de los omnes muertos por soterrar, Cron 133b35, and tanto tiempo estido daquella guisa por enterrar, Cron 674b21. In these instances, the por-infinitive indicates a falta de realización as well as a shade of purpose.

² Gram. III, § 330.

Fincar is unmentioned by Menéndez Pidal as a member of this group, because there are evidently no examples available in the Cid. The Crónica offers, however, several well defined instances of the same type of construction as that discussed above under estar. The difference between estar and fincar was merely that fincar in general indicated greater duration of time than estar when used with the por-infinitive (to remain, to be yet to do).

- ... quel no finco sino muy poco por cercar Cron 103b41

fincaua el rey don Alfonso por casar Cron 553a5
finco donna Dulce donzella por casar Cron 652a3

In the last citation above, the por-infinitive depends on the noun acting as predicate rather than on the verb fincar, thus making an entity of the phrase donzella por casar (marriageable girl). It also occurs in era estonçes donzella por casar, Cron 170b21. yazer.

In the one instance with yazer, the por-infinitive again indicates the near accomplishment of the action.

Diez considers ser to indicate possibility when used with por-infinitive, as opposed to the sense of estar por, cited above as meaning to be on the point of.¹ This is seen in the sentences below, where the futurity is not "precised." The underlying sense of purpose is frequently to be felt also. The Alixandre and the Crónica yield practically all the available examples.

In the last citation above, por casar depends rather on donzella than on era (see fincar above).

THE INDEPENDENT POR-INFINITIVE

55. This independent construction of the por-infinitive probably grew out of the frequent use of por with auer and ser to indicate the possible future accomplishment of an action, as discussed in the last section (e.g. lo que es por venir, Alix 1792; tres [días] an por troçir, Cid 307). Exactly the same type of futurity is found in the so-called independent por-infinitive as in that dependent on ser. The immediacy of the future action, as expressed by estar, yazer and the like, is almost never implied in the independent por-infinitive, rather the indefinite futurity usual in the ser locutions. In fact, sometimes the very same expressions are found, with or without ser. A good illustration of this point is at hand in SMill 477 (villas understood):

Granadas e menudas, por poblar e pobladas
Fueron en dar en esto todas pronunciadas

In this instance, por poblar e pobladas evidently acts as the subject of fueron, while in SMill 464 the same por-infinitive depends on eran:

Las que por poblar eran tan bien com las pobladas

The por-infinitives occurring with and without auxiliary are por casar, por venir, por poblar and por pagar. It will be remarked as one of the most important facts in this connection that most often within one and the same phrase a contrast will be made between the past and the future by means of the past participle and the por-infinitive: por casar e casado, por domar e domado, por poblar e poblado.

Por casar is noted as follows:

era cosa desapuesta . . . ueuir desordenado et por casar Cron 718a37

Darte yo casamiento, muger qual tu quisieras, por casar o casada Alix 370
por casar e casados SMill 204

In three cases por domar is noted in this independent use:

yentes brauas et por domar Cron 159a40
las aues e las bestias por domar e domadas Alix 639
las bestias por domar e domadas Sig 9

The first citation below is particularly interesting by reason of the contrast in tenses which it presents, por venir standing for the future of ser (later por venir is used as a single word to mean the future):

metran toda su fuerça en dios bendezir, al que fue et al que es, al que por venir Alix 2315
 los por venir Sac 269

A rare example of por destenprar occurs in Alix 1521:

vñas por destenprar, otras destenpradas

The most striking example of the independent por-infinitive occurs at the beginning of a sentence in Cron 487a45, where even without estar the future action of the infinitive is marked as immediate (cf. first paragraph, this section).

. . . fasta que ouieron crebantado el muro de la çibdad. Et ellos por entrarla, llegaron los moros . . .

The special use of this independent por-infinitive in por andar deserves attention. It is limited to the Crónica, but occurs frequently in this text. Always found in connection with the name of a month, it serves to indicate the number of days remaining in that month (Et fue esto dos dias ante de las calendas de setiembre, esto es, dos dias por andar del mes de agosto, Cron 667b45).

THE POR-INFINITIVE INDICATES CAUSE

56. The por-infinitive indicating the cause of an action is generally found to depend on a whole clause rather than on a single verb, since the por-infinitive takes the place of a subordinate clause having an inflected verb form. Certain verbs do, however, lend themselves most readily to the causal relation in the dependent infinitive (e.g. se preciauan por alançar, Cron 431b31, 520b5). This construction is shown to be frequent in the Portuguese examined by Otto, though por in other infinitive constructions is not as often employed, nor its uses as varied, in the Portuguese of Camões as in the Spanish of Berceo. It will be remembered that por is the only preposition of the por-pora-para group that can indicate cause, and that these others only fulfil the functions of goal and purpose. The most important of the texts in verse offer examples of this use, but a considerable majority of instances come from the Crónica, where the causal por may be said to be one of the regular constructions. The problem of definitively judging examples is at times encountered here because of the possibility of taking a given por-infinitive as expressing either purpose or cause without doing violence to the context in either case. It becomes simple, however, when the causal por-infinitive has a subject, as in por seer oy la cibdat . . . tan grand, Cron 42b28. At times there is remarked an approach to the subject-infinitive relation, with slight emphasis on the causal element: me pesa por errar tan mal . . . mis vassallos, Cron 612b37.

THE POR-INFINITIVE INDICATES MEANS

57. Diez recognizes this use of the Romance infinitive with prepositions derived from per.¹ He gives examples for the French and Italian, but none for the Spanish. Meyer-Lübke mentions the construction as a restricted use of Latin per-instrumental,² nor does he specially cite any instances for Spanish. There was evidently a fusion of functions in Spanish so that the por-infinitive, not originally per, took on this per-instrumental use, while para, really from per, lost it. The construction is so closely allied to the more frequent causal por-infinitive that it is only natural for por to have occasionally assumed an instrumental force. In fact, the rendition of a given de- or por-infinitive with instrumental rather than causal value is necessitated largely by the use of special verbs or phrases in the context (e.g. ganar used in three of the eight cases below).

sy omne non gana prez por dezir o por fer Alix 71

THE POR-INFINITIVE HAS A CONCESSIVE SENSE

58. No mention of this use of the por-infinitive is found in Diez, Meyer-Lübke or Menéndez Pidal, yet it is a very real sense in the few instances from the Crónica noted below. In two of the three citations, aun will be noted in the phrase aun

THE INFINITIVE WITH PORA

59. The origin of the pora-infinitive was evidently in the frequent use of por and a together, por alone not being definite enough to indicate the intended relation between the infinitive and the verb or clause on which it depended. The function of a was predominantly goal, while that of por was purpose. If the two were put together there was effected a very useful combination which fitted more accurately into the sense of numerous phrases than either preposition alone. The combination was not limited to taking the infinitive, but was allowed to govern a direct or indirect object. Menéndez Pidal¹ states it thus: "En vez de por para expresar el fin, se usa pora cuando es necessaria la preposición a que rija un complemento: pora myo Cid e alos sos a manos los tomar, Cid 701." With a taking an indirect object, pora appears in pora cristianos la dar, Cid 1191, 892, 1616. In such cases, the separation into por a is quite evident. It was, in general of course, a matter of indifference to the scribes whether the two words were written pora or por a. As the use of the prepositions together increased, they came to be considered as a unit, and were employed where a no longer indicated the object relation mentioned by Menéndez Pidal above (pora con ellos casar, Cid 1882, 3449). The fact that it was a progressive construction is indicated by a comparison of the use of pora-infinitives in the

Cid with those in the Crónica. The number of examples from the Cid is, indeed, almost negligible, while in the Crónica are found the great majority of the instances cited below. The pora-infinitive was permitted by the authors of the Crónica to usurp no small part of the legitimate territory of the construction with por. It could not, of course, encroach on those uses of por that had nothing to do with the original concept of purpose generally expressed by por. Thus the senses of por including cause, means, concession, etc. stood firm. As a rule, there is a notable difference between por and pora even when similarly governed, the ideas of suitable to, such as to (expressing a characteristic), being much more current in the pora-infinitive (see particularly its use with adjectives and nouns: semeiaua . . . ninno aun pora gouernar el regno, Cron 709a38; tiempo pora casar, Cron 601a43). Though rarely met in our texts outside of the Crónica, and not offering so varied a field as por, yet pora is a successful rival of por in its most common uses. It even surpasses por in one field, i.e. with adjectives such as acucioso, bueno and conuiniente (sotil . . . pora aprender toda arte, Cron 138a18; buenas pora ganar . . . tierra, Cron 22a3).

THE PORA-INFINITIVE WITH NOUNS

60. As was also true of por, the class of pora-infinitives clearly dependent on nouns is small in comparison with other infinitive constructions with pora. It is limited to about five nouns, the only frequent one of which is logar. In these examples, the difference can be felt between the pora-construction and that with por in the same places (e.g. with tiempo in Non es agora tiempo por en naves entrar, SOria 159; non son en tiempo pora casar, Cron 601a43; it is not time now to enter boats; they are not at a time suitable for marrying).

THE PORA-INFINITIVE WITH ADJECTIVES

61. With the exception of a few sporadic occurrences in the Alixandre and a doubtful one in the Cid (buenos e valientes para mio Cid huyar, Cid 892, where the a of pora may well be the personal accusative sign), available instances of pora-infinitive with adjectives all come from the Crónica. Poetry in general affected the por-construction. The total number of adjectives with pora is half again greater than with por, showing that at least the authors of the Crónica considered pora more appropriate for such use than por. It is also seen that they are more varied in sense, and are more generally representative of the whole group of adjectives than they were with por (pora: acucioso, liuiano, noble, sabio, sano, sotil, tierno, etc.; por: tan, tal, sabroso, grande, etc.). This is not surprising in view of the fact that the adjective regularly expresses a characteristic, and this is one of the uses most normal to the pora-infinitive as well (see § 59 above). The only individual adjectives found with both prepositions are bueno, firme, and presto (pora morir e para uencer firme estaua el, Cron 702a8; Ellos por alargarse, los otros por redrarlos, estauan todos firmes, Alix 2054; serien mas prestos para en armas entrar, Alix 1308; estaua presto por los guardar sanos, Cron 134a4).

Participles.

Only about half as many past participles take the para-infinitive as are noted with the por-infinitive. Probably this is due at least in part to the fact that past participles usually had a stronger verbal than adjectival force, and verbs in general affected the por-infinitive more often than that with para. The usual prepositional functions for a, por, pora, para of purpose and goal are evident in the examples cited below (eran dados para disputar, Cron 190a6; uió los castellanos mouidos para uencerse, Cron 416a10). As with por, the verbs particularly well represented here are those indicating some sort of preparedness (apareiado, aparellado, guarnido, guisado, etc.), and those expressing inclination, desire and related emotions (abiuado, dado, denodado, desesperado, etc.).

The a component of pora can be clearly felt in the citation below (cf. English given to disputing):

eran dados para disputar Cron 190a6

denodado (also used with por-infinitive).

por a lidiar la villa fue muy mas denodado Alix 1108

eran por a ferir todos tan denodados Alix 2028

desesperado (takes de-infinitive also). In this instance the pora-infinitive expresses degree rather than the usual purpose:

THE PORA-INFINITIVE WITH INTRANSITIVE VERBS OF MOTION

62. This group is numerically much weaker than the corresponding group with por-infinitive both in verbs and in individual examples. As a class, although the verbs of motion are not found as often with the pora- as with the por-construction, when so used the sense is more precised than with por. It is a notable fact that all but one of the examples cited below come from the Crónica, and the one exception is yva pora senbrar, Alix 2528. This is particularly interesting in view of the fact that pora was most fitting for use with verbs of motion because of its indication of goal (its -a indicating direction toward something) while por could only express purpose with them. Pora-constructions developed, however, late in our period, thus largely explaining the favor enjoyed by them in the Crónica and their apparent lack of favor elsewhere.

Numerous instances of the pora-infinitive are found depending on a clause of goal, the main verb of which is a verb of motion. As indicated under the por-infinitive above (§ 53), such cases closely resemble the regular construction with these verbs:

entraran en ella pora defenderla Cron 365a27

descendiendo contra mar . . . pora fazer dalli caualgadas et guerrear la tierra Cron 534b45

llegaron alli . . . pora yrse con el Cron 524a47

fuesse contra Salamanca pora saber que fazie el rey Cron 373a19

caualgar.

The a-infinitive is also noted with caualgar.

Los infantes caualgaron estonces pora yr fazer aquello Cron 438a39 el caualgo luego et sus hijos pora yrse pora alla Cron 516b12 caualgo pora uenirse a la frontera Cron 541b4

contender.

Like other verbs of striving and seeking (trabaiarse, buscar, etc.) contender considerably varies its infinitive relations (i.e. with de, por and en as well as with pora).

comenzaron luego a contender pora auer la guardia del rey ninno Cron 709b5

enderesçar (-nç-).

The infinitives with por and a also occur.

enderesçaron pora yr a las vistas Cron 600a50

enderesçaron pora yr a las vistas Cron 600b9

enderenço pora yr a Valencia Cron 551b29

yr.

The combination of goal and purpose in the pora-infinitive is well evidenced in the examples of this verb. The pure infinitive and that with a, por and para are likewise found with yr. The pora-infinitive may depend on an yr-clause of goal rather than on yr alone (yuan ellos a su palacio para fablar con ell, Cron 463a38; and Cron 339b19, 465b47, 704a3.

fue otra uez para lidiar con ellos Cron 28a23

fue derechamiento para destroyr Galizia Cron 29a54

. . . que fuessen todos con la condessa para prouar sil podrien sacar Cron 420b18

ellos yendo ya para ayudarlos Cron 440a4

mouer.

As an intransitive, mouer also takes the infinitive pure and with a. The transitive mouer takes the pure and a-infinitives, the reflexive those with a and pora.

quiso mouer para yr contra Espanna Cron 101b8

passar.

Infinitive constructions also occur with a and without preposition.

quisieron passar para andalla por ueer si era aun mejor que aquella Cron 217a4

sal(1)ir.

The pure, a- and pora-infinitive constructions occur with this verb.

salieron los de dentro para lidiar con ellos Cron 463b4

salio . . . para yr degollar el carnero Cron 504a51

sallio . . . para confirmar el pleito con el Cron 587b34

. . . que seliessen para yr a la batalla Cron 689a40

tornar.

The pure, a-, de-, pora- and en-infinitives are also noted with tornar as an intransitive verb; the a-, de- and para-infinitives with tornar as a reflexive; the a-infinitive with tornar only as a transitive. No iteration appears in tornar in this instance:

torno para acorrer a los suyos Cron 558a17

uenir.

This verb is not found as frequently with pora- as with por- infinitive. Instances of the pora-construction with uenir are taken from the Crónica only, while a large part of those having por come from the Cid, etc. The infinitive pure, as well as with de, a and por, is also noted with uenir. Cases of dependence on goal clauses with uenir: Cron 400a44, 443b51, 516b34, 527b13, 693b18.

uinieron pora auer batalla con ell, et matarle o echarle de la tierra Cron 339b39

uinieron pora acorrer a los del castiello Cron 406b49

uinie . . . pora correrle la tierra Cron 415b42, 449b5

THE PORA-INFINITIVE WITH REFLEXIVE VERBS

63. Approximately the same number of reflexive verbs take pora as por with the infinitive, though in neither class is the number of examples for each verb very large. In this section as in the last, all except one of the citations are from the Crónica (mouios pora lidiar toda la criazon, Alix 209). But while the Crónica particularly affects pora with the infinitive, it does not at all neglect por. At least half of the instances with por-infinitive come from this prose text. In both the por- and pora-groups are noted ayuntarse, guisarse and leuantarse, guisarse being used the most frequently (guisosse por yr a ueerla, Cron 38b19; leuantosse por yr su uia, Cron 146a36; for corresponding pora-constructions, see individual verbs below). A greater proportion of reflexives implying motion, hence naturally favoring the goal of a and pora, is found in this group than in the corresponding por-group (e.g. ayuntarse, esforçarse, leuantarse, mouerse and partirse below).

No other infinitive uses occur with the reflexive form of this verb, but as a transitive aguisar takes the por-infinitive also. The simple guisarse is noted frequently with por-, pora- and para-constructions.

aguisosse pora yr a so hermano Cron 23a34

ayuntarse.

Ayuntarse also takes the a- and por-infinitives.

se ayuntaran . . . para amparar el castiello Cron 287b7

esforçarse.

De, a and pora are noted with the infinitive in esforçarse locutions.

non dexauan de esforçarse para sobir por las pennas a arriba Cron 71a8

guisarse.

De, por and para are found in other infinitive uses of guisarse.

guisosse para yr a Carthago Cron 25b15, 153a37, 154a3

guisosse para lidiar Cron 159a22

estauan y guisados para guardar las entradas de Affrica Cron 53a17

en guisando se para alçar otra uez Cron 204b27

se guiso para yrlle ganar Cron 245a38

leuantarse.

Leuantarse also takes the pure infinitive, as well as that with de, a and por.

se non osarien alçar nin leuantar para correrle la tierra Cron 644a19

mouerse.

The a-infinitive also occurs with mouerse.

mouiosse . . . para yr lidiar con ell Cron 245a22

mouios para lidiar toda la criazon Alix 209

pararse.

As a transitive, parar is used once with the para-infinitive.

non auien con quien se parar para defendirse Cron 365a35

partirse.

It is a conspicuous fact that no other infinitive construction of partir is noted in these texts, whether as an intransitive or as a reflexive verb, except the de of separation.

partieron se luego para yr robar las tierras de Italia Cron 230a40 tornarse (Goal clauses occur in Cron 251a46, 354a18. De, a and para also occur in infinitive constructions of tornarse).

ouo sabor de tornarse pora ueer su tierra Cron 546a48

THE PORA-INFINITIVE WITH TRANSITIVE VERBS

64. This group is not as strong as the corresponding por-group. Aguisar and enbiar occur both with por- and with pora-infinitives (e.g. como aguisarie poyo . . . por veyer todo el mundo, Alix 2460; pora seyer omne bueno tu lo as aguisado, Alix 50). Of the verbs taking the pora-construction, those with which the purpose-infinitive may be said to approximate the object-infinitive are aguisar, aplazar, buscar and ordenar (el mandauan buscar pora matallo, Cron 128b8); with dar and tener the pora-infinitive has an almost purely purpose function, while with enbiar the element of goal predominates (for examples, see the individual verb below).

It is evident that instances of the infinitive depending on transitive verbs (with an object present) easily become ordinary cases of clausal dependence, since the modifiers of the transitive verb may minimize the closeness of relation between it and the infinitive: enuiaron le a Espanna, sennala-damiente pora conquerir e ganar Camora, Cron 29b31.

pora seyer omne bueno tu lo as aguisado Alix 50

aplazar.

aplazolos pora ser y aquel dia pora consagrар la eglesia de sant Yague Cron 381a41

buscar.

The de-infinitive object is also found with buscar. The construction with pora substitutes the element of purpose for the almost purely object function of the relative de-infinitive (Essos li buscaron de echarlo a mal, Duelo 70).

el mandauan buscar pora matallo Cron 128b8

dar.

For a detailed discussion of a very similar construction with dar, see § 44, dealing with the a-infinitive (dyol mucho a ganar, Alix 981). The de-infinitive also occurs with dar (diol . . . de comer, Cron 523b34).

les dieron aquel para justiciar Cron 29a43

so tal postura quel diesse el cuerpo . . . para leuar a Leon Cron 490b16

enbiar.

The pure, a- and por-infinitives are also noted with enbiar.

. . . quel enbiassen ballesteros et peones para combater Valencia Cron 576a22

enbio tres omnes buenos . . . para confirmar el pleito Cron 586b40

guisar.

The pure infinitive also occurs with the transitive guisar; de, por, pora and para with guisarse.

guiso sus huestes para yr Cron 201a5

parar.

Para-infinitive also occurs with parar as a transitive verb; a and pora with pararse.

las azes que auien paradas para lidiar Cron 221b33

tener.

Pora and para are found in practically equivalent infinitive uses with tener (Allen mar tenie oio para pasar, Cron 770b27).

no tenie ninguana cosa para dexar de comer Cron 130b52

Teniela el buen omne non para cavalgar,

Mas para los mezquinos lenna acarrear SMill 272

THE PORA-INFINITIVE WITH AUER, SER, ETC.auer.

65. Under auer but few instances of the pora-infinitive can be cited, but under ser cases are by no means so scarce. It will be recalled that the por-infinitive with ser and auer expressed a lack of realization of the action of the infinitive (§ 54), and that the related expression of immediate futurity also made itself felt. For the pora-infinitive no such conditions are evidenced. There is a much stronger element of purpose expressed in pora, and a much lesser degree of futurity and lack of realization. In Cron 104b17 is to be remarked the closest approximation of the pora- to the por-infinitive: ouieron siempre los de Roma para uencer. Even here pora uencer expresses little more of futurity than would the a-infinitive, if so used. Purpose is decidedly evident in the other three instances of auer with pora-infinitive.

todos auien vn cuer para trayer las manos Alix 1028

Avien para servirla mejor devoción Mil 618

Avia para mi, avia para dar Mil 760

fincar.

Along with auer and ser taking the por-infinitive was mentioned fincar fulfilling a similar function (i.e. that of expressing futurity or lack of realization; cf. § 54). Fincar with pora-infinitive occurs but twice, and then rather with a purpose sense than that noted for the por-infinitive:

para verter su agua fincoli el forado Mil 213

assi que non finque aqui ninguno sinon dos peones para guardar la puerta Cron 528a17

menguar (no other infinitive uses noted).

Purpose constructions are normal with this type of verb (cf. modern me falta dinero para viajar).

Mas para fer tal pasta menguabalis farina Mil 274

A slightly different situation is to be remarked in ser with the pora-infinitive. This construction has more of the futurity of the por-infinitive, as well as a sense that is best rendered into English by fit to, able to, of such a kind as to (los necios que no eran para salir, Cron 77a51). These delicate nuances are derived from the original a-function of goal, with added force given by the por-element of purpose in pora. A closer approximation than usual of the futurity so common in auer and ser with por-infinitive is evident in el dia que fino era aun para uenir, Cron 708a28.

THE PORA-INFINITIVE DEPENDS ON A CLAUSE

66. In § 53 were discussed in detail various types of the por-infinitive depending on a clause as a whole instead of on a single verb. The same facts are in general true for the pora-infinitive as for that with por. A not infrequent type is llegaron alli a Sant Pedro a ell aquel dia cient et quinze caualleros para yrse con el, Cron 524a47, where the goal of the arriving being already mentioned, the pora-infinitive loses the prime function it has with verbs of motion such as llegar (e.g. quiso mouer para yr contra Espanna, Cron 101b8). The close dependence of the pora-infinitive on the main verb is evident in ellos yendo ya para ayudarlos, Cron 440a4, as against the very loose construction of Despues desto un dia fuese el rey Almemon para su huerta con grand compania de moros para auer y su solaz, Cron 504a19. Striking illustration of the parallelism of pora with the infinitive and pora with a noun (indicating the goal of the action) is found in the citation above and in: tornosse para

Italia para predicar, Cron 251a46; tornose para Germania para guisarse, Cron 354a18. The separate and the collective force of the component parts of para is to be remarked in fuesse para Carmona et a Sevilla para conquerirlas, Cron 465b47.

THE INFINITIVE WITH PARA

67. In *para*¹ Old Spanish possessed a derivative of per ad very similar to pora, the much more frequent derivative of pro ad (compare with pora- and *para-*uses the archaic and illiterate English for to with infinitive, as in Luke VII, 25: What went ye out for to see?). From the texts covered by this study, a comparison between the two can hardly be made, especially in the matter of frequency, so far overshadowed was para by pora. As shown in the last few sections, pora was a successful rival of por in the favor of the authors of the Crónica for the indication of goal and purpose. But para did not rival pora, much less por, in this or any other of our texts. Per Abbat uses para only once, and then in place of pora:² para Calatayuth quanto puede se va, Cid 775. The Alixandre offers a few sporadic instances of para-infinitive, but the Crónica again comes to the rescue with at least enough evidence to show increasing popular favor for the para-construction. It is true that the same classes of verbs are noted with para as with pora, but instead of finding well-rounded and representative groups, only sporadic and occasional instances are at hand. The one group that might be expected to be strong, even with para, is that of the intransitive verbs of motion, but even here there are no regular examples of the construction at hand. Among the reflexives, there are only three verbs noted with para-infinitive: apartarse, guisarse and tornarse. Probably one reason for the infrequency of para was the very infrequent occurrence of *par*¹ (as used in oaths, etc. par la cabeza mia, Alix 652), while por was so generally used that pora was, for a considerable time, carried along with it. The later success of para was perhaps due at least in part to the fact that, if any clear distinction between por and the composed prepositions with a was subconsciously sought, it was much less confusing to use para than pora because of the too evident provenience of the latter.

An interesting and unique instance of ser with para-infinitive is noted in SDom 268, illustrating the function of goal in the a of para, as well as the futurity discussed for the por-infinitive with ser: non fue para complir lo el Abbat perezoso.

The one passage in which the para-infinitive depends on a goal clause is el fuese para el rey don Fernando a Toledo para meter rrecua a la frontera, Cron 737b43.

THE PARA-INFINITIVE WITH ADJECTIVES

68. At least five adjectives are noted with the para-infinitive, this group forming one of the strongest of the para-constructions at this time. In comparison with pora, and even with por which did not particularly affect use with adjectives, the para-infinitive is still conspicuously weak in numbers. Past participles formed a very important type of adjective construction under the por-pora groups. This type of infinitive use is entirely lacking for para.

bueno (used also with de, por and pora). The infinitive as subject is approximated in Alix 1449 (cf. claro below).

buena para poder fincar en su onrra . . . et para librar sus moros Cron 746a50

el jaspis que es bueno para omne lo traher Alix 1449

nunca para comer vi cosa tan ligera Alix 799

entendiendo quel era meior la fincada que la yda . . . para ençimar su conquista Cron 748b27

tal (used also with por-infinitive).

tenien que no auie nenguno dellos tal para uengallos de Annibal
 Cron 24b7

THE PARA-INFINITIVE WITH INTRANSITIVE VERBS OF MOTION

69. No regular examples of the para-infinitive with intransitive verbs of motion are at hand, although this construction may well be considered a most characteristic type with a, por and pora. This fact clearly emphasizes the paucity of available examples with para, not any incongruity in its use with the intransitives. In esi tiempo non era allegado Para regibir soldada, SOría 66, the para-infinitive depends on tiempo rather than on era allegado. For an instance of the para-infinitive depending on a goal clause, in which yr is the main verb, see §67.

THE PARA-INFINITIVE WITH REFLEXIVE VERBS

70. As was true of the intransitive verbs of motion cited above, so here with the reflexives, there are only three verbs to represent the group. These are, however, more actually representative of their type than are those noted under the other groups since each of the three reflexives is well known with other prepositions than para. One of these (guisarse) offers four examples, which must be considered noteworthy for para at this period. All the citations below come from the Crónica.

The a-infinitive is also found with apartarse.

se quisieron . . . apartar para amostrar su orgul Cron 758b38
guisarse.

De, por and pora are also noted with guisarse in infinitive constructions.

guisandose para venir Cron 355a43

se guisaua para pasar alla et yr sobre ellos Cron 770b46

guisosse para yr taiar Carmona Cron 749a2

para alla pasar se guisaua Cron 770b50

tornarse.

As reflexive or intransitive, this verb is found with all the prepositions indicating goal and purpose.

se torno para guisarse Cron 741b1

THE PARA-INFINITIVE WITH TRANSITIVE VERBS

71. Another small group, with varied though few examples, is this of the transitive verbs with para-infinitive. The following passage might perhaps better be cited as a sporadic instance of the noun with infinitive than under the transitive verbs, since the para-infinitive modifies the sense of cabeça with the suitable to, such as to, sense noted for the pora-infinitive: non he cabeça para andar sin cofia, Cron 752a42 (no era ya pora andar en guerras, Cron 213a1). Tener oio, on the other hand, is a regular verb and noun phrase governing the para-infinitive. Parar is most representative of the usual class of verbs belonging to this group. This type of infinitive construction of course easily becomes the ordinary case of the infinitive depending on a clause (see § 50).

This is a very representative verb of the transitive type. Pora-infinitive occurs with parar; the pora- and a-constructions with pararse. The phrase parar azes is also used in las azes que auien paradas pora lidiar, Cron 221b33.

reçebir.

No other infinitive uses are noted with reçebir.

A ti reçebió Don Xpo para ser su esposa Loor 204

Pora-infinitive is also used with tener, but not with a verb and noun phrase (Teniela el buen omne non pora cavalgar, Mas pora los mezquinos lenna acarrear, SMill 272).

Allen mar tenie oio para pasar Cron 770b27

THE INFINITIVE WITH EN

72. Diez¹ considers the Romance use of the infinitive with en to correspond in general to the Latin in with the gerund or participle (e.g. constans in amicis laudandis). Meyer-Lübke shows² that the extension of en is more notable in Spanish and Portuguese than elsewhere. Its sense can readily be understood in practically all instances, for it has preserved its primitive meaning and function better than most other prepositions. However, it has extended its sense to include the mental fields as well as the physical (en sus pensamientos),³ and to refer to the surface of things as well as to the inside (en la mesa). The preposition en was used with the gerund more commonly than with the infinitive in the intermediate stages between Latin and Romance (as in modern French en parlant à mes amis). The fact that the infinitive came to replace the gerund to such an extent with en in Old Spanish was probably due to the ever increasing prevalence of infinitive constructions in general in this language. Compared with the necessarily restricted field of the gerund, the infinitive could be utilized in an almost unlimited variety of ways. There was also the advantage that en had in itself most of the force of the gerund, and that if used with the infinitive a new field was opened for development, while if used with the gerund a mere strengthening of the same function resulted. One of the normal functions of the en-infinitive was to indicate the accompanying circumstances of an action (estan desauenidos en creer muchas malas creencias, Cron 185a17). This will be remarked in many of the citations below. The en-infinitive currently answers the questions where and how (metio en conjurarlo mucho maior fimeencia, SDom 697; auiuado en predicar, Cron 277a32). From its original sense of in, into, it comes to have a very real function of goal, not so frequent as in a, para, etc., but nevertheless easily recognized (e.g. with punnar en and contender en). The use of the en-infinitive with such phrases as meter fimeencia, meter mano, where the sense of the transitive meter determines the use of en, is particularly noteworthy (e.g. metio mientes en mejorar su tierra, Cron 294a48). Its fitness for answering the question how permits it in some cases to indicate the means of an action, as with the reflexives deleitarse and darse vagar. But en is particularly appropriate for use with adjectives (see following section: e.g. En laudar la Gloriosa todos eran ardientes, Mil 853; crudos eran en mal fazer, Cron 609a24).

² Gram. III, § 435.

THE EN-INFINITIVE WITH ADJECTIVES

73. One of the most normal constructions of the en-infinitive is with adjectives, since with them it indicates how the action of the infinitive is applicable to the sense of the adjective (muy sotil en assacar de suyo cosas nueuas, Cron 121b48; sabios . . . en defender nuestra ley, Cron 158a3). Delicate shades of other meanings can at times be felt in the en-infinitive (place where, means, time), particularly with participles which partake of the sense of the simple verb (auiuado en predicar, Cron 277a32; engannada en te combater, Cron 133b19). Even with participles the expression of manner is decidedly predominant in the en- infinitive, other senses merging imperceptibly into this one. The de-infinitive most nearly approaches the en-construction with adjectives, but is not so strong or individual in prepositional force (liuiano de creer el mal, Cron 451a3; franque en dar su auer, Cron 477b7). The de-infinitive is quite frequently susceptible of passive force, while activity is most often postulated by the en-infinitive (en veer muy çerteros, Sig 55; En laudar la Gloriosa todos eran ardientes, Mil 853; ligera de fazer, Cron 420b11; serie muy grieue cosa de contar, Cron 20a46). Comparatively few of the adjectives below are noted with other than the en-infinitive (exc. sabio, sabidor, auiuado, etc.). The best single illustration of the use of the en-infinitive with adjectives is found in Mil 404:

Fueron en emendarlo firmes e muy devotos.

THE EN-INFINITIVE WITH METER AND PONER

74. These two verbs are the most important representatives of the type of transitive verbs having an object with dependent en-infinitive. There is only one example of poner so used, but this is a normal illustration of the principle involved:

Ponian toda femencia en fer a Dios serviço SOría 13

In this instance, en has an almost literal sense of in, into, thus preserving its most primitive and inherent force. Meter likewise keeps this normal force for en in all the various locutions cited below, resembling very closely that of poner above. The most frequent single locution noted is meter femencia en (En buscarli muerte mala metien toda femencia, Mil 378). As was true of the en-infinitive with adjectives, there is also for these meter locutions a corresponding de-infinitive construction. Here again the relative de introduces practically an object-infinitive (. . . que uos meta en coraçon de sacarle ende, Cron 355a20). In one instance, the pronoun lo takes the place of the substantive with meter: lo que meter podiesse en captiuos sacar, SDom 363.

VERBS WITHOUT OBJECT TAKING EN-INFINITIVE

75. In this group are included all the verbs taking en-infinitive that do not have an object present such as was discussed under meter and poner in the section above (metio en conjurarlo mucho maior fimençia, SDom 697). Several of these verbs are real intransitives that do not take a direct object under any circumstances (pesar, estar, valer), while others will be found that occur quite frequently with such an object (dubdar, cuydar). It will be found that in nearly all instances with these verbs, the en-infinitive indicates the manner of the action (as it does with adjectives, etc.) and rarely has its literal sense of in, into, noted with the transitive meter and poner. The de-infinitive is perhaps the nearest approach among the prepositional uses to the en-construction with these verbs, yet here the object relation predominates with de, while with en that of manner and goal are more conspicuous (in the end coming to a moderate similarity of sense: siempre contiene de valer a cuitados, Mil 623; les era mester de contender en tenerse et non caer, Cron 71a22; Dixol que non dubdase de fer su maestria, Alix 2230; non dubdas en meterte a periglo de muerte, Cron 40b12). The indication of goal by the en-infinitive is best illustrated in its use with contender, punnar and trabajiar (also taking the infinitives with de and por), and this is an important extension of the en-function (punnaron en tollerse las tierras, Cron 5a35; trabajastes . . . en ganar çibdades, Cron 555b6). With estar, there is also a development of the place function in the preposition, and even greater immediacy of action is indicated than with por (estaua en desempararse et dar se ya a morir, Cron 91b33; li estaba por exir la almiella, SMill 343). With durar the en-infinitive is said to indicate time (en ganar aquellas villas mio Cid duró tres años, Cid 1169).¹ acordar.

The de-infinitive is also used with acordar; de, a, por and en with acordarse:

acuerdan todos los sabios en contar el fecho de los godos Cron 217b1

andar.

The prepositions a and por also introduce the infinitive with andar. The equivalent construction of substantive and infinitive is to be noted in this citation:

yo ando en seruicio de Dios et en uengar el mal Cron 564a33
consentir.

Consentir also takes the pure and de-infinitives.

non querie consentir con ell en seguir sus malas leys Cron 260b45

contender.

Next to punnar this is the most frequent verb taking the en-infinitive. Much the same sense is found in the two verbs, and with both of these the en-infinitive indicates the goal of the action (see introductory paragraph, this section). Contender also takes de, por and pora with its infinitive, de being most affected.

plorando delos oios contendia en orar SDom 579

crescer.

No other infinitive construction occurs with crescer.

crescio en tener mayor companna Cron 574a35

cuydar.

The first instance below shows the en-infinitive in equivalent construction with the substantive fechos. Both cases differ notably from the types with de- and with pure infinitive (cuydo de mentir, Alix 2271; non cuyo y peccar, SDom 581), cuydar with en being strong and literal (to think about, concerning).

cuydan en los fechos de la carne et en beuer Cron 151b27
 estauan cuydando en escoier rey entressi Cron 230a30

dubdar.

The de-infinitive with dubdar does not possess the slightly temporal sense given by en. The pure infinitive use is frequent with dubdar.

non dubdas en meterte a periglo de muerte Cron 40b12

entender.

The a-infinitive also occurs with entender.

El nono en cubdiçia mala guitar entiende Loor 90
estar.

Estar with en-infinitive indicates even greater immediacy of action in the infinitive than estar with the por-construction (see § 54). Usually it may be rendered by to be in the act of. The three instances at hand come from the Crónica.

estaua en desampararse e dar se ya a morir Cron 91b33 estudieron todas las compañias del Cid en guysar sus armas et en armarse et en cargar las azemilas Cron 637a16
 estando en partirse Cron 648b38

lazdrar.

No other infinitive construction is at hand for lazdrar.

mucho lazdre en la ganar Cron 605a30
 . . . Que io tanto lazdrasse en la muerte pedir Duelo 125

pesar.

The en-infinitive is here a variant for the subject-infinitive so common with de, or without preposition, and may have a temporal, instrumental or modal function. The personal subject here becomes the indirect object with an impersonal verb.

. . . quel pesarie por uentura en dezirle que . . . Cron 644a46

punnar.

This is the most frequent verb of the group, goal being indicated by means of the en-infinitive, in the same way as that noted for contender and trabaiar. This verb with en-infinitive is of frequent occurrence in the Crónica, but is not found elsewhere. The de-infinitive is also common with punnar. The two prepositions express two different views of the relation of punnar to its infinitive, de being rendered by relative to, with respect to . . . and en by to, toward the goal of . . .

punnaron en tollerse las tierras Cron 5a35

punnaron en la auer Cron 22a36

Two cases with en-infinitive occur in the Crónica. Both instances may be considered as somewhat exceptional, the first as an emphatic substitute for the simple conditional of the infinitive, the second more regular in its indication of the manner of fue con el.

dixieron que serien en ayudarle a todas las cosas Cron 631b25
fue con el en guardarle del enganno Cron 672a42

tardar.

No other infinitive use is noted with tardar.

era mejor de yr su carrera . . . que non tardar en combater
castiello Cron 695b31

tornar.

With verbs of motion en naturally has a place or goal function. The preposition a is much more frequent in this use (él a las niñas tornólas a catar, Cid 371). Iteration is not apparent.

tornaron le en seer sannudos Cron 75a3

començaron . . . a tornar en tener lo por mal si fuxiessen Cron 75a19

trabaiar.

As with contender and punnar, principally the goal of the effort is here shown by means of the en-infinitive. Trabaiarse appears as a reflexive with pure, por-, en- and de-infinitives.

trabaiastes siempre mucho en ganar çibdades Cron 555b6

valer (u-).

The en-infinitive indicates manner in the first instance below. An en-variant for the pure subject-infinitive is seen in the second citation; cf. pesar above.

Todos los dias del sieglo en levar lo adelant

El Cid siempre valdra mas Cid 1442

mas ualie en auer alguno dellos consigo . . . que non tenellos esparzudos Cron 23a7

THE EN-INFINITIVE WITH REFLEXIVE VERBS

76. A few reflexive verbs take en-infinitive to express the manner of an action (darse uagar, etc.). The cause or means is approximated with others (preciarse, deleytarse), while in at least one instance there is a place relation (fallarse). It is of course true that these relations are not absolute, but only relative; a fusion of functions can sometimes be noted (e.g. preciarse, cause and means) as well as instances where any one of several functions would fit sufficiently well (trabaiarse, goal, manner, time).

acordarse.

De, a and por are also used with the infinitive depending on acordarse.

non se acordaua en catar que omne era Cron 466a29

tan bien se acordara en guardar su omenaie et en quitar las arcas Cron 594a44

atreuverse.

The pure, de- and a-infinitives are noted with atreuverse.

In this instance, a developed place function is noted in en (cf. estar and ser with en-infinitive above).

fallaron se el et el senado en alongallos lo mas que pudiessen
Cron 230b48

preciarse.

The en-infinitive may express manner or cause with preciarse. The de-infinitive also expresses cause with this verb.

preciese en seruir a Dios Cron 311a14

trabaiarse.

trabaiaronse mucho en defender la cristiandat Cron 450b2

trabaiauase . . . en echar del regno a Yssem Cron 451b51

Trabaiarse also takes en-infinitive in Cron 632a33, 724a5.

THE INFINITIVE WITH OTHER PREPOSITIONS AND PREPOSITIONAL SUBSTITUTES

77. In this section will be treated the remaining prepositions, simple and composed, that occur in so few instances that individual classification is not necessary. These rarer prepositions and prepositional substitutes make up one of the most interesting word-groups of the language, because they illustrate the natural growth of language through the combination and adaptation of elements already present in the vocabulary of the people. In this way, participles might be utilized as prepositions (durante, excepto, etc.).¹ Another method of composing new prepositions was that of using adverbs with simple prepositions (most often de or a): acerca de, cerca de, ademas de, menos de, enantes de, fuera de. In some of these cases a preposition both precedes and follows the adverb. In this way acerca de can be analyzed as coming from ad circa de, enantes de from in ante-s de, etc. The adverb standing alone may be given the functions of a preposition (see fuera below). Aside from the method of combining the adverb and simple preposition to form new composed prepositions, there is the preposition and noun combination that likewise occurs quite often. Of this sort are the locutions en guisa de, en logar de, en uez de, por razon de, etc. These, when strictly analyzed, must be considered as a special type of the de-infinitive depending on a noun, but being employed in certain combinations so often they take on a group identity of their own. All the Romance languages utilize noun and preposition to form new combinations in the same way as Old Spanish. These combinations are theoretically limited only by the number and sense of the nouns concerned, since nearly all nouns offer themselves as possibilities for such combinations. Aside from these composed prepositions, there are of course several simple prepositions, employed only occasionally (e.g. sin and sobre), which are also treated in this section.

açerca de, cerca de.

One example is at hand for each of these two forms. In the first form the locative preposition ad is prefixed to the adverb, in the other the adverb completes its meaning by merely taking de with the governed word. Thus the sense must originally have been near in regard to, with respect to (relative de). It should also be noted that the a of açerca is naturally attracted by llegar. (It is of interest in this connection that the Cid uses aprés de in the sense of cerca de, but not with the infinitive: aprés son de Valençia, Cid 1559.¹)

llego ya el dia açerca de ponerse el sol Cron 703b46
estaua muy cerca de conquerillos Cron 30a35

ademas de.

Here again the adverb derives its prepositional function from the use of de.

fueron y grandes alegrías ademas de alançar a tablados et de boffordar et de correr todos et de iogar tablas Cron 431b21

(a)menos de.

This combination appears with the first preposition separate from, or joined with, the adverb (a menos de), or with a omitted entirely (menos de). This is one of the more frequent of these composed prepositions, though all instances with infinitive come from the Crónica.

enantes de, antes que.

The form antes de is to be expected in Old Spanish with the infinitive, but it is not found in the texts examined.¹ The combination enantes de occurs once with the meaning that antes de would have: iré a la cort enantes de yantar, Cid 3051. Here a purely temporal sense is felt. With the conjunction que, ante and antes are found frequently in the Crónica with the infinitive, but the temporal sense of enantes de is not conspicuous in these constructions. On the other hand, the analogy with mas que seems to have operated, as well as that with the comparatives taking que and the infinitive in the sense of than to. But the temporal idea persists in antes, giving a fusion of the temporal and comparative senses in antes que that is not found in mas que and its equivalents. The use of a temporal for a more correct comparative construction is particularly natural to popular speech (cf. vulgar English I'd sooner do this than that and the colloquial I'd starve before I'd accept charity).

This interesting combination is noted only in the Crónica, but in this text is exceptionally frequent. It expresses purpose, and may be considered as a strong substitute for the simple por. A rare instance of two purpose clauses depending on a

PART III

SPECIAL CONSTRUCTION

THE INFINITIVE WITH SUBJECT

78. One of the most striking constructions of Old Spanish is the infinitive with subject. Spanish cannot pretend to rival Portuguese in originality of treatment of this construction, since in Portuguese alone is found the personal or inflected infinitive with a distinctive form for each person, the personal ending being added to the infinitive.¹ It is not within the territory of this immediate study to describe in great detail the Portuguese construction, interesting as it is, but it deserves a few words in passing, so that the Spanish construction may not be confused with it. The personal infinitive in Portuguese has the same raison d'être as the infinitive with subject in Spanish, i.e. the necessity of defining the subject of the action, especially in those cases where confusion was probable. Basta ser dominante is not definite, but with eu added, all doubt of the application of the sentence disappears: Basta ser eu dominante. Inasmuch as at certain times ser eu had the form seres (tu) as its correspondent for the second person, seres was adopted as an infinitive form with clear indication of the subject. In the same way, other personal endings were borrowed from the conjugated verb to be added to the infinitive for similar use in the other persons. Originally restricted to phrases where the subject of the conjugated verb and that of the infinitive were different, the personal infinitive acquired gradual extension until it was employed where its subject was the object of an active verb, and then where the two verbs had the same subject. It was optional whether the personal infinitive should be employed when the subject was the same for the two verbs, but when different, the personal form was regular.

In Spanish no endings are borrowed from the conjugated verb for use with the infinitive in order to indicate the subject. The subject takes the nominative form when standing with the infinitive, not the accusative as in Latin, and has no apparent organic connection with any other member of the sentence. This fact is noted by Diez,¹ who goes on to say that such a construction was absolutely foreign to Latin, and that it may be the transformation of a compound proposition into a simple proposition with the nominative form of the pronoun kept intact. Thus el decirlo yo no os ofenda may represent que lo digo yo no os ofenda, with the legitimate subject retained when the infinitive replaces the finite form of the verb. Diez would in the same manner explain the personal infinitive of the Portuguese. It does not seem to me necessary to seek so complicated an explanation for the Spanish construction. Subject-pronouns were apparently used with the infinitive in much the same way as with any other verb form. For the sake of emphasis, or to avoid ambiguity, the subject-pronouns were employed with ordinary finite verb forms (quiere que yo diga la verdad). What more simple than using the same pronouns for the same purpose with the infinitive, especially since, due to the unsettled language conditions of the times, the classical rule of accusative with infinitive might naturally have been forgotten long since by the common people who could neither read nor write? This use of subject-pronouns with the infinitive was especially facilitated by the non-existence in Spanish of intermediate pronominal forms for cases of emphasis and ambiguity (such as the French disjunctives). In any event, the fact remains that the ordinary subject-pronouns did function with the infinitive in Spanish and there appears no evidence of any desire to employ the object-pronouns similarly (Lazdrar tu e tu Fijo, Duelo 92).

The use of the article with the infinitive when the latter has a subject (el decirlo yo) later becomes regular in Spanish, but in the texts utilized for this study is not noted. This is probably due in part to the fact that in the early language the pronoun-subject stands before the infinitive more frequently than in later periods, and in this position the article is quite superfluous (non me semeia guisado de uos yo conseiar que uayades, Cron 497b41). The third person masculine singular (el, ell) as subject is kept regularly after the infinitive, thus avoiding any possible misconception (sin consentirlo ell o su fijo, Cron 431a13; mas guisado era de yr ell, Cron 437a7).

In the paragraphs immediately following, examples of the pure infinitive with subject will first be given, then corresponding instances of the prepositional infinitive similarly used. These illustrative examples are taken from various texts, and show a variety of syntactical constructions. The Cid is notably lacking in such infinitive types, while the Crónica employs them abundantly.

Mil 739

Serate, sancto padre, por grant yerro tenido
 Tu entrar en tal cena, yo fincar desfamnido SLaur 67

bien es que gela dedes, et yo darle XV de mios hijos Cron
 507a26

In the three citations above, the subject is a pronoun and clearly in the nominative. Other instances of such pronominal use will be found under the prepositional infinitive. A considerable number of noun- and pronoun-subjects occur, which are also considered to be regular, i. e. in the nominative.

. . . fago me mucho marauillado pueblo de tan grant prescio por natura senado, en cosa tan abierta seyer tan embargado Alix 1190

- Asmaua en pues esto ques dexasen vençer, desenparar las tiendas e todo el auer,
 todos por do estouiesen foyr a grant poder
 e toda la villa de Troya trasponer Alix 722

Certain instances occur in which there is no grammatical subject actually functioning with the infinitive, but in which the word that might have been construed as subject is given a prepositional relation to the finite verb forms. These phrases indicate how thoroughly a slight shift of expression may change the grammatical relation of the infinitive and its modifiers. A typical example of the process involved is Alix 26:

seria fiera onta e grant mal paresçer
 por el rey Alixandre a omne obedecer

The sense of the passage would remain perfectly intact if the por were omitted and el rey made the subject of the infinitive, but, with por employed, el rey becomes little more than an indirect object, and obedeçer is deprived of its subject. Other prepositional relations will be noted in the two cases below, and can be analyzed in some such way as that above:

Grand cosa fue, Eneas, duna muger poder se defender contra tantos enemigos, e non se poder defender a la tu lengua sola Cron 42a41

es bien atales omes solitarios beuir Alix 1602

Theoretically, any preposition is eligible to govern an infinitive with subject. In practice de is by far the most common. A typical example of the de-infinitive thus employed is at hand in Cron 692a28: non serie ligera de mantenerla et gouernarla un prinçep. Here the comparatively unattached condition of prinçep is particularly felt. Furthermore, the use of the de-infinitive in this phrase is clearly the same as in such passages as Cron 751a32: serie guisado de yr, etc. The prepositional relations in the citations below are numerous and interesting, but do not merit individual explanation at this time. It should be remarked, however, that the subject of the infinitive may be neither a noun nor a pronoun but a whole clause (Mas porque es graue cosa de se mudar lo que viene por natura, no pudo estar Nero que al cabo no saliesse del consejo de los sabios, Cron 124b14).

639b8

Examples of the prepositional object of the finite verb standing in place of the infinitive subject are noted as follows:

Graue cosa fue all arçobispo de uenir . . . al rey Cron 291a19
uerguença es a omne de dezirlo nin de oyrlo, et mucho mas ya de

THE INFINITIVE IN APPosition WITH A NOUN OR PRONOUN

79. The following citations illustrate the use of the infinitive in apposition with some other word in the sentence. This is strictly speaking the grammatical category to which the infinitives in these passages belong, yet probably in few cases did the writer or speaker realize any material difference between the cases of so-called apposition and those of the corresponding regular infinitive constructions. A good example of this type of infinitive occurs in SOria 200: Yo non lo merezria de seer tan honrrada. To the poet it doubtless made little difference

(except in syllabication) whether the lo were used in the sentence or not, though perhaps a degree of anticipatory emphasis was gained by the use of lo. In certain other cases, however, the pronoun had a somewhat more real function: De dezir falsoedades aslo por heredat, SMill 267. Here the phrase would be rather incomplete without the pronoun, as a summing up at this point avoids any possible misunderstanding of the sense. It will be seen that the appositional infinitive was decidedly frequent, an abundance of examples being cited below. The infinitive might stand in apposition with a pronoun, a noun, or an adjective treated as a substantive (Prisieron un conseio . . . Tornar enna Gloriosa que los façie arder, Mil 388; Siempre cobdiçie esto, . . . apartarme del mundo, SDom 100; qual serie lo mejor: de yr a los moros o atenderlos, Cron 392a38). Several instances are noted of the infinitive in apposition with a relative clause and its antecedent (lo que era peor de todo, uenir los d'Africa a Roma, Cron 45a49). There is found a greater proportion of the citations of this section from the poetry of the period than from the prose of the Crónica. This is doubtless due to the fact that it is the usual tendency of prose to be more simple and direct in its employment of language than poetry, and this construction of the infinitive in apposition was a decidedly indirect, though natural, mode of expression. In any case, the infinitive in this use is either pure or has de to introduce it (there being about twice as many without preposition as with de). Of those with de, a majority come from the Crónica. Only one case is noted in the Cid, and that is mentioned by Menéndez Pidal:¹

lo quel rogava Alfons el de León
de dar sues fijas a ifantes de Carrión Cid 1928

Other illustrations of the appositional type follow:

VITA

WILFRED ATTWOOD BEARDSLEY was born at Woodbury, Conn., April 4, 1889; attended the public schools of New Haven, Conn., from 1896 to 1903; prepared for college in the Taft School, Watertown, Conn.; received prizes in English and French in the Sheffield Scientific School, Yale University, in 1907; studied in Cuba during the winter of 1907-1908; received the degree of Bachelor of Arts from Yale College in 1911, with Special Honors in Spanish; was elected to Phi Beta Kappa and Alpha Sigma Phi at Yale; spent the summers of 1909 and 1911 in special studies in Spain and France; was Instructor in French in the Tome School, Port Deposit, Md., 1911-1912; Instructor in French in the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale University from 1912 to 1915; studied in the Graduate School of Columbia University from 1915 to 1917, receiving the doctorate in 1917; served in the United States Army and in the American Expeditionary Forces in France from 1917 to 1919, acting largely as liaison officer with the French service de santé; was Instructor in French during the Spring semester of 1919 in the University of Minnesota; was appointed Assistant Professor of Romance Languages and Acting Chairman of the Department in Goucher College, Baltimore, in 1919; became Professor and Chairman of Department in the same institution, in 1920. The delay in the final revision and publication of the accompanying dissertation — the type-setting of which had been nearly completed before the period of Mr. Beardsley's military service — is accounted for by his necessary absence abroad.
